PROTESTATION.

In obedience to the decrees of Urban VIII., I protest that of the miraculous deeds and gifts ascribed in this work to certain servants of God, and not already approved by the Holy See, I claim no other belief than that which is ordinarily given to history resting on mere human authority, and that in giving the appellation of Saint or Blessed to a person not canonized or beatified by the Church, I only intend to do it according to the usage and opinion of men.

"The True Spouse of Christ.—This work has been translated into German; many editions of it have been published in that language as well as in the Italian. It is regarded as a complete collection of all the author has written in his various works on religious perfection"—Life of Blessed Liguori, by M. Jeancard, Missionary of Provence, published in Lyons, 1820, p. 566.

THE AUTHOR'S NOTICE.

This work, as appears from the title, is intended particularly for Nuns. However, only a small portion of it is directed exclusively to them; the remainder, but especially what regards the observance of the vows of religion, regular discipline, and the perfection of the religious state, is equally suited to religious of all denominations; and what regards the Christian virtues will be found highly useful even for seculars.

To each chapter I have annexed prayers, replete with pious affections, knowing that such prayers are very acceptable to Religious who seek perfection. For, as St. Denis the Areopagite says, "divine love consists in the affections of the heart more than in the knowledge of the understanding." In human sciences knowledge excites love; but in the science of the Saints, love produces knowledge. He that loves God most knows him best. Besides, it is not lofty and fruitless conceptions that unite the soul to God, and make her rich in merits before the Lord.

THE

True Spouse of Jesus Christ.

CHAPTER I.

On the excellence of virginity consecrated to God in the religious state.

1. Virgins who have the happiness of dedicating themselves to the love of Jesus Christ by consecrating to him the "lily" of their purity, are, in the first place, as dear to God as his angels. "They shall," says the Redeemer, "be like the angels of God in heaven"—Matt. xxii. 30. Such is the immediate fruit of the virtue of chastity. Hence St. Ambrose says, that "Whoever preserves this virtue is an angel; and that whoever violates it is a demon"—S. Amb. Lib. de Offic. Baronius relates (anno 490, num. 23 in comp.) that when a certain virgin, called Georgia, was on the point of death, a great multitude of doves were seen hovering about her; that when her body was brought to the church, they flew to that part of the roof which corresponded with the place of the corpse, and remained there till after the interment. By all who saw them, these doves were regarded as angels paying respect and homage to the body of the virgin. Chastity is justly styled an angelic and celestial virtue. "Because," says St. Ambrose, "this virtue has ascended even to the heavens, and thence taken an example to be imitated on earth; and because only in heaven, the residence of its spouse, is it practised in all its perfection"—Lib. de Virg.

2. Besides, whoever consecrates her virginity to Jesus Christ becomes his spouse. Hence, writing to his disciples, St. Paul did not hesitate to say: "I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ"—2 Cor. xi. 2. I have promised to present to Jesus Chirst your souls as so many chaste spouses. In the parable of the virgins, Jesus himself wished to be called their spouse: "They went out to meet the bridegroom...they went in with him to the marriage"—Matt. xxv. 1. The Redeemer, whenever he speaks of virgins, calls himself their spouse; but when he speakes of others, he calls himself master, pastor, or father. Hence that elegant verse of St. Gregory Nazianzen, "and chaste virginity is adorned by Christ her spouse." These espousals are perfected in faith. "And I will espouse thee to me in faith"—Osee. ii. 20. Jesus Christ has, in a special manner, merited for mankind the gift of virginity, and is therefore followed by virgins whithersoever he goeth.—Apoc. xiv. 4. The Mother of God once said to a soul, "that a spouse of Jesus Christ ought to have a great esteem for all virtues; but that purity, by which she is principally assimilated to her divine spouse, should hold the first place in her heart." St. Anthony of Padua says, "that though, according to St. Bernard, all just souls are spouses of the Saviour, still virgins consecrated to God are his spouses in a more special manner"—Serm. de Virg. Hence St. Fulgentius calls Jesus Christ the only spouse of all consecrated virgins: "Unus omnium sacrarum virginum sponsus"—S. Fulg. ep. iii. c. 4.

3. A young person desirous of settling in the world, will, if she be prudent, in the first place carefully inquire into the circumstances and dispositions of all who pretend to her affections, and will diligently seek to ascertain who of these is most deserving of her heart, and from who she may expect the greatest happiness in this life. A religious, on the day of her profession, is espoused to Jesus Christ; for in the ceremony of profession, the bishop says to the novice about to be professed: "I espouse thee to Jesus Christ; may he preserve thee inviolate. Receive, then, as his spouse, the ring of faith, that, if thou serve him with fidelity, he may give thee an eternal crown." Let us, then, ask the spouse of the Canticles who is this divine bridegroom. Tell me, O sacred spouse, what are the qualities of thy beloved, the only object of thy affection, who renders thee the happiest of women? "What manner of one is thy beloved of the beloved, O though most beautiful among women?"—Cant. v. 9. She will answer: "My beloved is white and ruddy, chosen out of thousands"—Cant. v. 10. My beloved is rendered white by his innocence, and ruddy by the ardour with which he loves his spouses. In a word, he is so loving, so perfect in all virtues, and at the same time so courteous and affable, that he is of all spouses the most dear and amiable. "There is nothing," says St. Eucherius, "more glorious, nothing more beautiful, nothing more magnificent than he is." "These happy virgins, then," says St. Ignatius, Martyr, "who are consecrated to Jesus Christ, may be assured that they have obtained the most beautiful, the most noble, the most opulent, and most amiable spouse that can be found in heaven or on earth"—S. Ign. Mart. epis. ad Antioch.

4. Hence blessed Clare of Montefalco used to say that her virginity was so dear to her, that rather than lose it, she would be content to suffer the pains of hell during her whole life. Hence, as we learn from St. Ambrose, the glorious virgin, St. Agnes, when offered for husband the son of the Roman Prefect, justly answered that she had found a better spouse. St. Domitilla, the emperor's niece, through a love of virginity, refused the hand of Count Aurelian; and when it was argued that she might lawfully marry him, because, although a gentile, he would allow her to remain a Christian, she replied: "If to a young woman were offered the choice of a monarch or a peasant, which would she prefer? If I marry Aurelian, I must renounce the nuptials of the King of heaven, and would not that be the extreme of folly? You may therefore tell the Count that I cannot accede to his proposal." Thus she preserved her virginity which she had consecrated to Jesus Christ; and rather than prove unfaithful to her divine spouse, she suffered to be burned alive by her barbarous lover. The holy virgin St. Susanna made a similar reply to the Emperor Diocletian, who offered her the title of Empress on the condition that she would marry his son-in-law Maximin, whom he had created Cæsar. In punishment of her refusal she was rewarded with the crown of martyrdom. Many other holy virgins have declined the nuptials of earthly monarchs to become the spouses of Jesus Christ. Thus the blessed Jane, the Infanta of Portugal, refused the hand of Louis XI., King of France; Blessed Agnes, that of the Emperor Ferdinand II.; and Elizabeth, the daughter and heiress of the king of Hungary, rejected the proposal of marriage with Henry, the Archduke of Austria.

5. Besides, whoever consecrates her virginity to Jesus Christ, is devoted entirely to God, in body as well as in mind. "The unmarried woman," says St. Paul, "and the virgin thinketh on the things of the Lord; that she may be holy both in body and in spirit. But she that is married thinketh on the things of the world, how she may please her husband." 1 Cor. vii. 34. Virgins consecrated to God think only of God, and desire only to belong to him without reserve; but married persons, being of the world, can think of nothing but of the things of the world. Hence the Apostle adds: "And this I speak for your profit; not to cast a snare upon you, but for that which is decent, and which may give you power to attend upon the Lord, without impediment"—Ibid, iii. 35. Thus, poor worldlings meet with insurmountable difficulties in the way of virtue: and, the more exalted their rank, the greater the obstacles to their sanctification.

6. To become a saint in the world, it is necessary for the married woman to adopt the means of sanctification, to frequent the sacraments, to make long and frequent mental prayer, to practise many interior and exterior mortifications, to love contempt, humiliations, and poverty; and, in a word, to make every effort in her power to please God. She must, then, be perfectly detached from the world and all its goods, and perfectly free from the control and tyranny of human ties. But, how can a married person find the time, the opportunities, and the helps necessary for recollection and continual application to the things of God? "She that is married thinketh on the things of the world, how to please her husband." The married woman must provide for her family, educate her children, please her husband, his parents, brothers, and relations, who are sometimes to her a constant source of trouble. Hence the Apostle says, her heart must be divided, and her affections fixed partly on her husband, partly on her children, and partly on God. What time can she have for continual prayer, for frequent communion, when, with all her efforts, she is not able to attend to the wants of the house?

The husband must be attended; if his directions be neglected, or his commands be not immediately executed, he breaks out into complaints and reproaches. The servants disturb the house, at one time, by their clamour, or their quarrels; at another, by their importunate demands. The children, if small, are a perpetual source of annoyance, either by their cries and screams, or by the endless variety of their wants; if grown up, they are an occasion of still greater inquietude, fears and bitterness, by associating with bad companions, by the dangers to which they are exposed, or the infirmities with which they are afflicted. How, in the midst of so many difficulties and embarrassments, is it possible for the married woman to attend to prayer, or to preserve recollection? And, as to her communions, they can scarcely be as frequent as once a week. She may, indeed, have strong desires of sanctification; but, to pay great and constant attention to the affairs of her soul, will be morally impossible. The very privation of the opportunities of attending to the things of God, may be made a source of great merit by patient submission to the divine will, in the unhappy state in which she is placed. All this is indeed possible; but to practise patience and resignation, in the midst of so many troubles and distractions, without the aid of prayer, or of spiritual reading, or of the sacraments, will be exceedingly difficult and almost impracticable.

7. But, would to God that seculars were exposed to no other evils than the obstacles to their devotions, to constant prayer, and the frequent use of the sacraments. Their greatest misfortune is to be in continual danger of losing the grace of God and their own immortal souls. They must appear like their equals, they must employ servants, and support their rank. They must go abroad to visit their friends, and, in these visits, they must converse with a variety of characters. At home they must hold constant intercourse with their own families, with their relatives, and with the friends of their husband. Oh! how great, on such occasions, is the danger of losing God! This is not understood by young persons, but it is well known to those who are settled in the world, and who are daily exposed to such dangers.

8. Oh! how unhappy and miserable is the life of the generality of married persons! I have known the circumstances, the feelings, and dispositions of numberless married persons, from the highest to the lowest classes of society; and how few of them were content! The bad treatment of husbands, the disaffection of children, the wants of the family, the control of relatives, the pains of childbirth, which are always accompanied with danger of death, the scruples and anxiety of conscience regarding the flight of occasions, and the education of children, plunge poor seculars into endless troubles and agitation, and fill their souls with continual regret for not having been called to a happier and more holy state. God grant that, in the midst of such troubles and agitation, many of them may not lose their immortal souls, and that, along with passing through a hell in this life, they may not be condemned to an eternity of torments in the next! Such is the unhappy condition of many of those who have engaged in the married state. But you will ask, are there no saints among so many thousands of married persons? I answer, that there are some who sanctify themselves in the world by suffering a continual martyrdom; by bearing, for God's sake, all crosses and troubles with patience and cheerfulness, and by peacefully and lovingly offering themselves in all things to God. There are some who attain this high degree of perfection, but they are like the white flies. And you will find that such holy souls are always employed in works of penance, and that they continually aspire after the sanctity and disengagement of those who have consecrated their virginity to Jesus Christ, devoted their lives to the glory of God, and have embraced a state of constant happiness.

9. The state, then, of virgins consecrated to Jesus Christ, and who are entirely devoted to his divine love, is, of all states, the most happy and sublime. They are free from the dangers to which married persons are necessarily exposed. Their affections are not fixed on their families, nor on men of the world, nor on goods of the earth, nor on the dress and vanities of women. To appear like their equals, and to please their husbands, married persons must wear rich apparel and costly ornaments; but a virgin consecrated to Jesus Christ only requires a garment which will cover her body. In her, vanity of dress, or the decoration of her person, would be a scandalous exhibition. Besides, consecrated virgins are not troubled with the cares of a house, a family, and a husband; their sole concern, the only desire of their hearts, is to please Jesus Christ, to whom they have dedicated their souls and bodies, and all their affections. They are unshackled by worldly ties, by subjection to friends or to relatives, and are far removed from the noise and tumult of the world. Hence, they have more time, and better opportunities for prayer, spiritual reading, and frequent communion. Their minds are more free to think on the affairs of their soul, and to practise recollection and union with God. "For," says Theodoret, "she that is a virgin has her mind free from useless thoughts." A religious, then, has no other occupation than to hold constant and familiar converse with God. Ecumenius, in his commentary on the words of St. Paul, "that she may be holy both in body and in spirit," says, "that her body is sanctified by chastity, and her spirit by familiarity with God." St. Anselm says, that in the mere exemption from the cares of the world, to think on the things of the Lord, virgins receive an abundant compensation for all their temporal sacrifices: "Si nulla ei merces amplior virginem sequeretur, sufficeret hæc sola prælatio: cogitat quæ Domini sunt"—S. Anse. in 1 Cor. vii. Hence, the saint adds, that virgins consecrated to God, not only shall receive great glory in heaven, but shall be also rewarded beforehand by the enjoyment of continual peace on earth. "Non solum in futuro sæculo, sed et in præsenti requiem habet virginitas"—Loc. cit.

10. Religious who aspire to perfection are the beloved of Jesus Christ, because they have consecrated to him their bodies and their souls, and seek nothing in this life but to do his holy will. St. John, because he was a virgin, was called the beloved disciple of Jesus: "whom Jesus loved"

—John xiii. 23. Hence, in the divine office, we read of him, that "he was chosen a virgin by the Lord, and of all the apostles was the most beloved."—Resp. noct. 1. Virgins are called the first fruits of God. "For," says St. John, "they are virgins. These follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. These were purchased from among men the first fruits to God, and to the Lamb"—Apoc. xiv. 4. But why are virgins called the first fruits of God? "Because," says Cardinal Hugo, in his commentary on the preceding passage, "as first fruits are the most delicious, so virgins consecrated to God are most pleasing and dear to Him."

11. The spouse in the canticles "feedeth among the lilies"—Can. ii. 16. One of the sacred interpreters, explaining these words, says that, "as the devil revels in the uncleanness of lust, so Christ feeds on the lilies of chastity." Venerable Bede asserts, "that the hymn of the virgins is more agreeable to the Lamb than that of all the other saints"—Bed. in Apoc. xiv. 4. So great is the excellence of virginity, that the Holy Ghost says, "no price is worthy of a continent soul." Hence Cardinal Hugo teaches that in the other vows a dispensation is sometimes granted, but not in the vow of chastity; because such is the value of continence, that its loss cannot be compensated. The price of chastity may be estimated by the answer of Mary to the Archangel Gabriel: "How shall this be done, because I know not man?"—Luke i. 34. By these words she showed her readiness to renounce the offered dignity of Mother of God, rather than forfeit her virginal integrity.

12. St. Cyprian says, that "virginity is the queen of all virtues, and the possession of every good"—S. Cyp. de Virgin. Speaking of virginity, St. Ephrem says, "if you have loved it, you will be favoured by the Lord in all things"—S. Ephrm. de Virt. cap. 9. St. Bernadine of Sienna teaches, that "virginity prepares the soul to see her spouse Jesus by faith in this life, and by glory in the next." Oh! what an immense weight of glory is prepared for those who dedicate their virginity to Jesus Christ. The Redeemer showed to that great servant of God, Lucretia Orsini, the sublime dignity to which consecrated virgins are raised in heaven. In the vision she exclaimed, "Oh! how dear are virgins to God and to Mary." Theologians teach that virgins are honoured in heaven with a special crown of glory and of joy. "And no man," says St. John, "could say the canticle, but those hundred and forty-four thousand, who were purchased from the earth"

—Apoc. xiv. 3. St. Augustine. explaining this passage, says, that the joys of the virgins are not given to the other saints of God: "Gaudia propria virginum Christi non sunt eadem non virginum, quamvis Christi; nom sunt alia."

13. But, to be the virginal spouse of Jesus Christ, it is not sufficient to be a virgin ; it is necessary to be a prudent virgin, and to carry a lamp always filled with oil, that is, a heart inflamed with the love of God. The foolish virgins were indeed virgins ; but, because there lamps were extinguished, they were shut out from the marriage, and were told by the bridegroom that he knew them not. A virgin, then, who wishes to be a true spouse of the Redeemer, ought to desire and seek nothing but to love and please Jesus Christ. "If," says St. Bernard,"he become a spouse, he will change his language, and say : If I am a spouse, where is my love? God requires to be feared as a master, to be honoured as a father, and to be loved as a spouse."—Serm. 83, in Cant.

14. To be a faithful lover of Jesus Christ, her spouse, and to preserve unsullied the lily of her purity, a virgin must adopt the necessary means. The principal means of acquiring an ardent love of Christ are mental prayer, communion, mortification, retirement. Although each of these means is fully discussed in another part of this work, still, a brief notice of them in this place will not be irrelevant. The first means to love Jesus Christ is mental prayer. Mental prayer is that blessed furnace in which the soul is inflamed with divine love. "And," said holy David, "in my meditation a fire shall flame out"—Ps. xxxviii. 4. In temptations against purity, the immediate invocation of the divine aid is absolutely necessary. The venerable Sister Cecilia Gastelli used to say, "without prayer chastity cannot be preserved." "As I knew," said Solomon, "that I could not otherwise be continent, except God gave it, I went to the Lord, and besought him with my whole heart" —Wis. viii. 21. The second means is holy communion. "This," says St. Bonaventure, "is the cellar of wine into which the King of Heaven brings his spouses to set in order charity in their hearts, teaching them to love God above all things, and their neighbours as themselves." The third means is mortification. "As the lily among the thorns, so is my love among the daughters"—Cant. ii. 2. As the lily blooms among thorns, so virginity is preserved only amidst mortifications. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that "chastity flourishes only among thorns." To fulfil the obligations of the religious state, in the midst of amusements, worldly attachments, and conversations with seculars, in the midst of sensual gratifications, of indulgence of the palate, of the eyes, and of the ears, is utterly impossible. Religious purity can be preserved only among the thorns of mortification. "A virgin," says St. Basil," should be immaculate in all things, in the tongue, the ears, the eyes, the touch, and above all, in the mind"—S. Bas. de Vera Virg. To be faithful to her spouse, a virgin must be immaculate in her tongue by the delicacy of language, and by abstinence as much as possible from conversations with men; she must be immaculate in the ears, by shunning, like death itself, all worldly discourses; immaculate in her eyes, by modesty of looks, always restrained so as never to fix them on the face of a man; immaculate in touch, always observing the greatest caution towards herself and others; but, above all, immaculate in her soul, rejecting every unchaste thought as soon as it is presented to the mind, by invoking the assistance of Jesus and Mary. As a queen tempted by a negro slave, contemptuously turns away without condescending to notice him, so the spouse of Jesus Christ should reject, with disdain and horror, every immodest thought which intrudes itself into the mind. To preserve her soul and body free from stain, she must also chastise her flesh, by fasting, abstinence, by disciplines, and other penitential works. And if she have not health or strength to practice such mortifications, she ought, at least, to bear in peace her infirmities and pains, and to accept cheerfully the contempt and ill-treatment she receives from others. "The spouse follows the Lamb withersoever he goeth"—Apoc. xiv. 4. Jesus Christ has not walked before us in the way of pleasures and honours; no, he has chosen the rugged path of pains and opprobrium. Hence many holy virgins have loved sufferings and contempt, and have joyfully encountered torments and death.

15. The fourth means is retirement. "Thy cheeks are beautiful as the turtle dove's"—Cant. i. 9. The spouse in the Canticle is compared to the turtle, because the turtle avoids the company of other birds, and delights in solitude. A religious appears beautiful in the eyes of Jesus Christ, only in retirement and at a distance from the society of men. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi was accustomed to say that chastity is a plant that thrives only in enclosed gardens and in the midst of thorns. A religious should observe not only the enclosure of the convent, but also that of the senses; and therefore, unless compelled by duty or by obedience, she should never approach the door, the grate, or the windows. "Jesus," says St. Jerome, in his Epistle to Eustochia, "is a jealous spouse: he is unwilling that your face be seen by others." The Savionr, then, is greatly displeased with with the conduct of those who seek to appear before seculars, and delight in their conversation. Virgins, distinguished for sanctity, always seek retirement, and when it is necessary to go into the company of men, they endeavour to deform their persons, so as to excite feelings of aversion, rather than sentiments of affection. Bollandus relates, that "St. Andregesina, a virgin, besought the Almighty to change her beauty into deformity. Her prayer was heard, and she was instantly covered with a leprosy, which made her an object of horror to all who beheld her." James of Vibriaco (in Spec. Exemp. 19,) says that "St. Euphemia, to free herself from the attention of a person that was greatly attached to her, cut off her nose and lips, saying, 'vain beauty, you shall be no longer an occasion of sin to me.'" St. Antonine relates, and Baronius (anno 670, Num. xxxix. 6) confirms the narration, that St. Ebba, abbess of the convent of Collingamens, fearing an invasion of the barbarians, cut off her nose and upper lip, and that all the other nuns, amounting to thirty in number, followed her example. The barbarians came, and, seeing the religious so deformed, set fire to the convent, and burned them alive." The Church has placed all these holy virgins in the catalogue of her martyrs. It would not be lawful for others to imitate the heroic conduct of these saints: they acted from an impulse of the Holy Ghost. But, from their example, religious may learn how much virgins, inflamed with the love of Jesus Christ, shun the company and despise the esteem and affections of men. A religious should conceal herself as much as possible from the view of men. At her espousals with Jesus Christ, she renounced the world and all its vanities. Such is the compact which she made with him, when in answer to the question, "Do you renounce this world and all its vanities?" —she answered—"I renounce them." St. Jerome, in his eighth epistle to Demetria, says: "Now, since you have left the world, fiulfil your solomn engagements, and do not conform to this world"—Ep. 8, ad Demetr.

16. If you desire to possess the purity which becomes the spouse of Jesus, you must cut off all dangerous occasions, you must cherish a holy ignoranoe of all that is opposed to chastity, and abstain from readiug whatever has the slightest tendency to sully the soul. If, at the grate, language, unbecoming to your state be ever uttered, you should immediatly withdraw, or change the subject of conversation, otherwise you shall have much to suffer from the temptations by which you will be assailed. If fire does not always burn, it never fails to scorch. A look, an endearining expression, or a trifling gift, often enkindles a spark which soon becomes an infernal, a consuming fire. In all that regards purity, too much caution cannot be observed. Trust not in your own strength ; believe one who has known a thousand cases in which that sublime virtue was lost by exposure to danger. If you say, I will expose myself so far, and no farther, be assured that, before you perceive your danger, you will be plunged into the precipice. If, in voluntary perils, you have hitherto escaped ruin, thank God for your preservation, but tremble for the future. Saints have retired into the deserts to preserve the virtue of chastity : and will you rush into unnecessary danger? It is particularly difficult for those who are in the vigor of youth to practice immaculate purity while they converse with young men on worldly subjects, jesting with them, and smiling at expressions which ought to cover them with shame. Fly, fly from all such occasions. Explain to the confessor not only your temptations, but also the occasions of them, and ask his advice about the best means of removing them.

17. The day on which a virgin is espoused to Jesus Christ is to him a day of great joy. "Go forth," he says in the Canticles, "ye daughters of Sion, and see King Solomon in the diadem, wherewith his mother crowned him on the day of his espousals and the day of the joy of his heart"—Cant. iii. 11. Yes, the day on which a religious consecrates her virginity to Jesus Christ, is to him a day of triumph and exultation, provided she dedicates her whole being to his love and glory, and prepares herself in a becoming manner for her espousals with the God of holiness. On such days the Redeemer calls on all paradise to rejoice with him. "Let us be glad and rejoice, and give glory to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath prepared herself"—Apoc. xix. 7. The ornaments which the Lamb requires in his spouses are the virtues recommended in the Gospel, but particularly charity and purity. "He will make the chains of gold inlaid with silver"—Cant. i. 10. These chains of gold, inlaid with silver, signify the virtues of charity and chastity. These, as we learn from St. Agnes, are the garments and jewels with which the lamb decorates his spouse : "He surrounded my right hand and my neck with precious stones. The Lord clothed me with a garment of golden texture, and adorned me with immense necklaces"—Resp. in Festo. St. Agn. 21 Jan.

18. Seculars direct all their attention to the things of the world ; but the spouses of Jesus Christ seek God, and God alone. Of religious it is written : "This is the generation of them that seek him"—Ps. xxiii. 6. These holy virgins whom you see confined within their convents, poor and humble, are the generation of blessed souls who seek nothing on earth but God's glory. "You, then, O consecrated virgins," says Thomas of Villanova, "should contend with each other, not about the pre-eminence of your birth, the superiority of your talents, nor the amplitude of your fortunes, but for the first place in the esteem and affections of Christ Jesus, and for the highest claim to familiarity with him, to humility and obedience." St. Jerome, in one of his letters to Eustochia, who wished to consecrate her virginity to Jesus Christ, writes : "Since, my child, you come to the service of God, the Holy Ghost admonishes you to stand in justice, and to prepare your soul for temptation ; to practice patience in humility ; for gold is tried in the fire. No one can serve two masters. You will, therefore, despise the world, and, espoused to Christ, you will sing, the Lord is my portion for ever"—Epis. 22, ad Eus. Religious, on the day of profession, change their names, to show that on that day they die to the world to live to Christ, who died for them. All Christians should, according to St. Paul, die to themselves, and live only to Jesus Christ. "And Christ died for all, that they also who life may not live to themselves, but unto him who died for them and rose again"—2 Cor. v. 15. But if all do not attend to the instructions of the apostle, religious, at least, who are the chosen spouses of the Redeemer, should fiulfil them. The venerable Sister Francis Farnese regarded the remembrance of being the spouses of Jesus Christ as the most powerful means of exciting her religious to fervour and perfection. "It is certain," she would say to them, "that since you have been raised to the dignity of his spouses, God has chosen each of you to be a saint."

19. St. Augustine, addressing a religious, says: O happy virgin! if you know not your dignity, endeavour to estimate its excellence by the doctrine of the saints. You have the most beautiful of spouses, who, by selecting you from among thousands, and making you his spouse. has given you a pledge of affection, from which you may learn how ardent should be your love for Him"—Tom. 9 de Dil. Deo. cap. iv. And St. Bernard, in his fortieth sermon on the Canticle of Canticles, addressing consecrated virgins, says; "Have nothing to do with the world; forget all things; reserve yourself for the Lord, whom, from all things, you have chosen for your inheritance." Cease, O spouse of Jesus, to think of yourself or of the world: you belong no longer to yourself or to the world, but to that God to whom you are consecrated. Forget all things, and attend to him only who has chosen you for his spouse. "Your God," continues the saint, "has chosen you; and how many have been cast away who could not obtain the grace which has been bestowed on you? Your Redeemer and your spouse has preferred you before all these; not because you were more worthy, but because he loved you more than them—Ibid. You have not chosen God, but God has first chosen you for his spouse. How many has he left in the world who could not obtain the dignity to which you have been raised? He has chosen you in preference to them; he has called you to his tabernacle, not because you had superior claims, but because his love for you was greater than his love for them. The saint then concludes: "Wherefore," saith the Lord, "behold thy time is the time of lovers.' Reflecting, then, upon these things in your soul, place all your hope and affection in Jesus, your spouse, who has loved you with an everlasting love, and in mercy has drawn you to himself"—Ibid.

20. Whenever, then, O spouse of Jesus, the world solicits your affection, answer in the words of St. Agnes: "Depart from me, food of death; I am already espoused to another lover." All the affections of my heart shall be reserved for my God, who has loved me before I could love him. A religious, when she receives the veil on the day of profession, makes use of similar language. "He has placed," she says, "a seal on my forehead, that I admit no lover but him." My spouse has covered my face with this veil, that not seeing, and not being seen, I may have no lover but Jesus. St. Jerome exhorts religious to take a holy pride in this exalted dignity of spouses of the Redeemer. "Learn," he says, "O spouse of God, a holy pride. Know that you are raised above worldlings, and say: 'I have found him whom my soul sought: I will hold him and will not let him go'"—Ep. 22. Seculars glory in their nuptials with men of rank and fortune; but you who are the spouses of The King of Heaven, can boast of better espousals. Say, then, with pride and with joy: I have found the object of my affections; I will embrace him with love, and will not permit him to depart from me. It is love that unites the soul with God. "But above all things," says St. Paul, "have charity, which is the bond of perfection"—Cor. iii. 14.

21. Sublime, indeed, is the dignity of virgins; each of them can glory and say: "I am espoused to him whom the angels serve." He to whom the celestial spirits ar dently desire to minister is my spouse; with his own ring he has pledged me, and with a crown has adorned me as his own spouse. My Creator, the sovereign of the universe, has espoused me, and, conferring upon me a crown, has raised me to the dignity of a queen, But, O sacred virgin, remember that while you remain on earth this crown is not eternal, and that by your negligence it may be lost. "Hold fast that which thou hast, that no man take thy crown"—Apoc. iii. 11. Hold fast your crown, that no one may be able to snatch it from you; disengage yourself from all affection to creatures; unite yourself more and more every day to Jesus Christ by love, by petitions, and by continual supplication, that he may never suffer you to abandon him. "Jesus, my spouse, never permit me to be separated from thee." And when creatures seek to take possession of your heart, and to banish the Son of God from your soul, trust in the divine aid, and say with the apostle, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Neither life, nor death, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord"—Rom. viii.

PRAYER.

O Jesus, my Saviour and my God, how have I merited this singular favour, that while thou hast left in the world so many innocent souls, thou shouldst have chosen me, a sinner, for thy spouse, to live in thy own house here on earth, that I might afterwards receive from thee an eternal crown in heaven? O Lord, since thou hast bestowed upon me so great a grace, grant me light to understand its value and strength to be always grateful for it, and with my whole soul to correspond with the love which thou hast borne me. Thou hast chosen me in preference to many others; it is my duty to prefer thee to all. Thou hast given thyself entirely to me; it is but just that I present my whole being to thee, and that thou be the sole object of all my love and of all my affections. Yes, my Jesus, I love thee above all things; I desire to love thee alone. Thou hast given thyself to me without reserve: I offer myself entirely to Thee. I beseech thee to accept this oblation, and not to refuse the affections of a heart that once loved creatures, and even preferred them before thee, the Sovereign Good. Accept and preserve my soul and body. Without thy assistance I can do nothing; without it I shall certainly betray thee. Since thou hast chosen me for thy spouse, make me a faithful and grateful spouse. O sacred fire, burning in the heart of Jesus, inflame my soul, and destroy in my heart every affection which is not for him; make me live only to love this my amiable spouse, who has given his life to be loved by me. O Mary, mother of God, since I am the spouse of thy Son, thou art not only my queen, but my mother. And since it was by thy intercession that I have been detached from the world, conducted into this house of God, and made the spouse of thy Son, assist me now, and do not abandon me for ever. Grant that my life and death may be worthy a spouse of Jesus Christ. Amen.

CHAPTER II.

On the advantages of the Religious State.

Well may the words of the Canticle of Moses and of the children of Israel, after their delivery from the tyranny of Pharaoh and the bondage of Egypt, be applied to religious: "In thy mercy thou hast been a leader to the people which thou hast redeemed, and in thy strength thou hast carried them to thy holy habitation"—Exod. xv. 13. As the Hebrews, compared with the Egyptians, were in the Old Law the beloved people of God, so religious, contrasted with seculars, are, in the New Law, the chosen spouses of the Saviour. As the Hebrews went forth from Egypt, a land of labour and of slavery, where God was not known, so religious retire from the world, which gives to its servants no other recompense than pains and bitterness, and in which God is but little known. Finally, as the Hebrews in the desert were guided by a pillar of fire to the land of promise, so the spouses of Jesus Christ are conducted by the light of the Holy Ghost into the sanctuary of religion—the bright image of the promised land of heaven. In heaven there is no self-will; no thirst for earthly riches or for sensual pleasures; and from the cloister, these pernicious desires, by means of the holy vows of obedience, poverty, and chastity, are effectually excluded. In heaven, to praise God is the constant occupation of the saints, and in religion, every action of the community is referred to the glory of his name. "You praise God," says St. Augustine, "by the discharge of every duty; you praise him when you eat or drink; you praise him when you rest or sleep"—St. Aug. in Ps. 146. You, O sacred virgin, praise the Lord by regulating the affairs of the convent, by assisting in the sacristy, at the turn, or at the gate; you praise the Lord when you go to the table; you praise him when you retire to rest and sleep; you praise him in every action of your life. Lastly, in heaven, the saints enjoy continual peace, because there they find in God the source of every good; and, in religion, where God alone is sought, in him is found that peace which surpasses all understanding, and that content which the world cannot give. Well, then might St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi say, that the spouse of Jesus should have a high esteem and veneration for her holy state: since, after baptism a vocation to religion is the greatest grace which God can bestow.

2. You, then, should hold the religious state in higher estimation than all the dignities and kingdoms of the earth. In that holy state you are preserved from sins, which you would commit in the world; there you are constantly occupied in holy exercises; there you meet every day with numberless opportunities of meriting an eternal crown. In this life, religion makes you the spouse of a God, and, in the next, will raise you to the rank of queen in the eternal kingdom of his glory. How did you merit to be called to that holy state, in preference to so many others who had stronger claims than you? Black, indeed, must be your ingratitude, if, for the benefit of your vocation, you do not thank God every day with all the affections of your soul. The advantages of the religious state cannot be better described than in the words of St. Bernard: "Is not that a holy state in which a man lives more purely, falls more rarely, rises more speedily, walks more cautiously, is bedewed more frequently, rests more securely, dies more confidently, is purged more quickly, and rewarded more abundantly?" St. Ber. de Bono. rel. Let us examine these advantages separately, and meditate on the great treasures which each of them contains.

3. First.—"Vivit purius."—"A religious lives more purely." Surely all the works of religious are, in themselves, most pure and acceptable before God. Purity of action consists principally in purity of intention, or in a pure motive of pleasing God. Hence our actions will be agreeable to God in proportion to their conformity to his holy will, and to their freedom from the corruption of self-will. The actions of a secular, however holy and fervent she may be, partake more of self-will than those of religious. Seculars pray, communicate, hear mass, read, take the discipline, and recite the divine office when they please. But a religious performs these duties at the time prescribed by obedience—that is, by the holy will of God. For, in her rule and in the commands of her superior she hears His voice. Hence, a religious, by obedience to her rule and to her superior, merits an eternal reward, not only by her prayers and by the performance of her spiritual duties, but also by her labours, her recreations, and attendance at the turn; by her meals, her amusements, her words and her repose. For, since the performance of all these duties is dictated by obedience, and not by self-will, she does in each the holy will of God, and by each she earns an everlasting crown.

4. Oh! how often does self-will vitiate the most holy actions! Alas! to how many, on the day of judgment, when they shall ask, in the words of Isaias, the reward of their labours—"Why have we fasted, and thou hast not regarded?—have we humbled our souls, and thou hast not taken notice?"—to how many, I say, will the Almighty Judge answer—"Behold, in the day of your fast, your own will is found"—Isa. lviii. 3. What, he will say, do you demand a reward? Have you not, in doing your own will, already received the recompense of your toils? Have you not, in all your duties, in all your works of penance, sought the indulgence of your own inclinations, rather than the fulfilment of my will? Abbot Gilbert (Serm. 87) says, that the meanest work of a religious is more meritorious in the sight of God, than the most heroic action of a secular. St. Bernard asserts (Serm. 4 in Ps. qui habitat) that if a person in the world did the fourth part of what is ordinarily done by religious, she would be venerated as a saint. And has not experience shown, that the virtues of many, whose sanctity shone resplendent in the world, faded away before the bright examples of the fervent souls, whom, on entering religion, they found in the cloister? A religious, then, because in all her actions she does the will of God, can truly say that she belongs entirely to him. The venerable M. Mary of Jesus, foundress of the convent of Tolsoa, used to say, that, for two reasons, she entertained a high esteem for her vocation; first, because a religious enjoys the society of Jesus Christ, who, in the holy sacrament, dwells with her in the same habitation; secondly, because a religious having by the vow of obedience sacrificed her own will and her whole being to God, she belongs unreservedly to him.

5. Second.—"Cadit rarius."—"A religious falls more rarely." Religious are certainly less exposed to the danger of sin than seculars. Almighty God represented the world to St. Anthony, and before him to St. John the Evangelist, as a place full of snares. Hence, the holy Apostle said, that in the world there is nothing but the "concupiscence of the flesh," or of carnal pleasures; "the concupiscence of the eyes," or of earthly riches; "and the pride of life," or worldly honours, which swell the heart with petulance and pride. In religion, by means of holy vows, these poisoned sources of sin are cut off. By the vow of chastity, all the pleasures of sense are for ever abandoned; by the vow of poverty, the desire of riches is perfectly eradicated; and by the vow of obedience, the ambition of empty honours is utterly extinguished.

6. It is, indeed, possible for a Christian to live in the world without any attachment to its goods, but it is difficult to dwell in the midst of pestilence and to escape contagion. "The whole world," says St. John, "is seated in wickedness"—1 John v. 19. St. Ambrose, in his comment on this passage, says, "that they who remain in the world live under the miserable and cruel despotism of sin." The atmosphere of the world is noxious and pestilential, whosoever breathes it easily catches spiritual infection. Human respect, bad example, and evil conversations, are powerful incitements to earthly attachments and to estrangement of the soul from God. Every one knows that damnation of numberless souls is attributable to the occasions of sin so common in the world. From these occasions religious, who live in the retirement of the cloister, are far removed. Hence St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi was accustomed to embrace the walls of the convent, saying: "O blessed walls! O blessed walls! from how many dangers do you preserve me." Hence also blessed Mary Magdalene of Orsini, whenever she saw a religious laugh, used to say: "Laugh and rejoice, dear sister, for you have reason to be happy, being far away from the dangers of the world."

7.—Third—"Surgit velocius."—"A religious rises more speedily." If a religious should be so unfortunate as to fall into sin, she has the most efficacious help to rise again. Her rule, which obliges her to frequent the holy sacrament of penance; her meditations, in which she is reminded of the eternal truths; the good examples of her saintly companions, and the reproofs of her superiors, are powerful helps to rise from her fallen state. "Woe," says the Holy Ghost, "to him that is alone, for when he falleth he hath none to lift him up"—Eccl. iv. 10. If a secular forsake the path of virtue, he seldom finds a friend to admonish and correct him, and is therefore exposed to great danger of persevering and dying in his sins. But in religion, "if one fall, he shall be supported by the other"—Eccl. iv. 10. If a religious commit a fault, her companions assist her to correct and repair it. "She," says St. Thomas, "is assisted by her companions to rise again."

8. Fourth.—"Incedit cautius."—"A religious walks more cautiously." Religious enjoy far greater spiritual advantages than the first princes or monarchs of the earth. Kings indeed abound in riches, honours, and pleasures, but no one will dare to correct their faults or point out their duties. All abstain from alluding to their defects, through fear of incurring their displeasure ; and to secure their esteem many even go so far as to applaud their vices. But if a religious go astray her error will be instantly corrected ; her superiors and companions in religion will not fail to admonish her, and to point out her danger ; and even the good example of her sisters will remind her continually of the transgression into which she has fallen. Surely a Christian, who believes that eternal life is the one thing necessary, should set a higher value upon these helps to salvation, than upon all the dignities and kingdoms of the earth.

9. As the world presents to seculars innumerable obstacles to virtue, so the cloister holds out to religious continual preventives of sin. In religion, the great care which is taken to prevent light faults is a strong bulwark against the commission of grievous transgressions. If a religious resists temptations to venial sin, she merits by that resistance additional strength to conquer temptations to mortal sin ; but if, through frailty, she sometimes yields to them, all is not lost—the evil is easily repaired. Even then the enemy does not get possession of her soul ; at most he only succeeds in taking some unimportant outposts, from which he may be easily driven ; while, by such defeats, she is taught the necessity of greater vigilance and of stronger defences against future attacks. She is convinced of her own weakness, and being humbled and rendered diffident of her own powers, she recurs more frequently, and with more confidence, to Jesus Christ and his holy Mother. Thus from these falls, the religious sustains no serious injury ; since, as soon as she is humbled before the Lord, he stretches forth his all-powerful arm to raise her up. "When he shall fall, he shall not be bruised, for the Lord putteth his hand under him"—Ps. xxxvi. 24. On the contrary, such victories over her weakness contribute to inspire greater diffidence in herself, and greater confidence in God. Blessed Egidius, of the order of St. Francis, used to say, that "one degree of grace in religion is better than ten in the world ; because in religion it is easy to profit by grace, and hard to lose it ; while in the world, grace fructifies with difficulty, and is lost with facility."

10. Fifth.—"Irroratur frequentius."—"A religious is bedewed more frequently." O God, with what internal illuminations, spiritual delights, and expressions of love, does Jesus refresh his spouses at prayer, communion, in presence of the holy sacrament, and in the cell before the crucifix! Christians in the world are like plants in a barren land, on which but little of the dew of heaven falls, and from that little, the soil, for want of proper cultivation, seldom derives fertility. Poor seculars! They desire to devote more time to prayer, to receive the holy Eucharist, and to hear the word of God more frequently; they long for greater solitude, for more recollection, and a more intimate union of their souls with God. But temporal affairs, human ties, visits of friends, and restraints of the world, place these means of sanctification almost beyond their reach. But religious are like trees planted in a fruthful soil, which is continually and abundantly watered with the dews of heaven. In the cloister the Lord continually comforts and animates his spouses by infusing interior lights and consolations during the time of meditation, sermons and spiritual lectures, and even by means of the good example of their sisters. Well, then, might Mother Catherine of Jesus, of the holy order of St. Teresa, say, when reminded of the labours she had endured in the foundation of a convent: "God has rewarded me abundantly by permitting me to spend one hour in religion in the house of his holy mother."

11. Sixth.—"Quiescit securius."—"A religious rests more securely." Worldly goods can never satisfy the cravings of the human soul. The brute creation, being destined only for this world, are content with the goods of the earth; but being made for God, man can never enjoy happiness except in the possession of the divinity. The experience of ages proves this truth; for if the goods of this life could content the heart of man, kings and princes, who abound in riches, honours, and carnal pleasures, should spend their days in pure, unalloyed bliss and felicity. But history and experience attest that they are the most unhappy and discontented of men, and that riches and dignities are always the fertile source of fears, of troubles, and of bitterness. The Emperor Theodosius entered one day, unknown, into the cell of a solitary monk, and after some conversation, said: "Father, do you know who I am? I am the Emperor Theodosius." He then added: "Oh! how happy are you, who lead here on earth a life of contentment, free from the cares and woes of the world. I am a sovereign of the earth, but be assured, father, that I never dine in peace."

12. But how can the world, a place of treachery, of jealousies, of fears, and commotions, give peace to man? In the world, indeed, there are certain wretched pleasures which perplex rather than content the soul; which delight the sense for a moment, but leave lasting anguish and remorse behind. Hence the more exalted and honourable the rank and station a man holds in the world, the greater is his uneasiness, and the more racking his discontent; for earthly dignities, in proportion to their elevation, are accompanied with cares and contradictions. We may, then, conclude that the world, in which the heart-rending passions of ambition, avarice, and the love of pleasures, exercise a cruel tyranny over the human race, must be a place not of ease and happiness, but of inquietude and torture. Its goods can never be possessed in such way, that they may be had in the manner, and at the time, we desire their possession; and when enjoyed, instead of infusing content and peace into the soul, they drench her with the bitterness of gall. Hence, whosoever is satiated with earthly goods is saturated with wormwood and poison.

13. Happy, then, the religious who loves God, and knows how to estimate the favour which he bestowed upon her, in calling her from the world and placing her in religion; where, conquering, by holy mortification, her rebellious passions, and practising continual self-denial, she enjoys that peace which,according to the Apostle,exceeds all the delights of sensual gratification: "The peace of God, which surpasseth all understanding"—Phil. iv. 7. Find me, if you can, among those seculars on whom fortune has lavished her choicest gifts, or even among the first princesses or queens of the earth, a soul more happy or content than a religious divested of every worldly affection, and intent only on pleasing God? She is not rendered unhappy by poverty for she preferred it before all the riches of the earth; she has voluntarily chosen it, and rejoices in its privations; nor by the mortification of the senses, for she entered religion to die to the world and to herself; nor by the restraints of obedience, for she knows that the renunciation of self-will is the most acceptable sacrifice she could offer to God. She is not afflicted at her humiliations, because it was to be despised that she came into the house of God. "I have chosen to be an abject in the house of my God, rather than dwell in the tabernacles of sinners"—Ps. lxxxiii. 11. The enclosure is to her rather a source of consolation than of sorrow, because it frees her from the cares and dangers of the world. To serve the community, to be treated with contempt, or to be afflicted with infirmities, does not trouble the tranquillity of her soul, because she knows that all these make her more dear to Jesus Christ. Finally, the observance of her rule does not interrupt the joy of a religious, because the labours and burdens which it imposes, however numerous and oppressive they may be, are but the wings of the dove, which are necessary to fly to, and be united with, her God. Oh! how happy and delightful is the state of a religious, whose heart is not divided, and who can say with St. Francis, "My God my all."

14. It is true that, even in the cloister, there are some discontented souls; for even in religion there are some who do not live as religious ought to live. To be a good religious, and to be content, are one and the same thing; for the happiness of a religious consists in a constant and perfect union of her will with the adorable will of God, Whosoever is not united to him cannot be happy; for God cannot infuse his consolations into a soul that resists his divine will. I have been accustomed to say, that a religious in her convent enjoys a foretaste of paradise, or suffers an anticipation of hell. To endure the pains of hell is to be separated from God; to be forced against the inclinations of nature, to do the will of others; to be distrusted, despised, reproved and chastised, by those with whom we live; to be shut up in a place of confinement, from which it is impossible to escape; in a word, it is to be in continual torture without a moment's peace. Such is the miserable condition of a bad religious; and therefore she suffers on earth an anticipation of the torments of hell. The happiness of paradise consists in an exemption from the cares and afflictions of the world; in the conversations of the saints; in a perfect union with God, and the enjoyment of continual peace in God. A perfect religious possesses all these blessings, and therefore receives, in this life, a foretaste of paradise.

15. The perfect spouses of Jesus have, indeed their crosses to carry here below; for this life is a state of merit, and consequently of suffering. The inconveniences of living in community are burdensome; the reproofs of superiors, and the refusal of permission, galling; the mortification of the senses painful, and the contradiction and contempt of companions, intolerable to self-love. But to a religious who desires to belong entirely to God, all these occassions of suffering are so many sources of consolation and delight; for she knows that by embracing pain, she offers a sweet odour to God. St. Bonaventure says, "that the love of God is like honey, which sweetens every bitter." The venerable Cæsar da Bustis addressed a nephew, who had entered religion, in the following words: "My dear nephew; when you look at the heavens, think on paradise; when you see the world, reflect on hell, where the damned endure eternal torments without a moment's enjoyment; when you behold your convent, remember purgatory, where many just souls suffer in peace, and with a certainty of eternal life." And what more delightful than to suffer (if suffering it can be called) with a tranquil conscience? than to suffer in favour with God, and with an assurance that every pain will one day become a gem in an everlasting crown? Ah! the brightest jewels in the diadems of the saints, are the sufferings which they endured in this life with patience and resignation.

16. Our God is faithful to his promises, and grateful beyond measure. He knows how to remunerate his servants, even in this life, by interior sweetness, for the pains which they patiently suffer for his sake. Experience shows that religious, who seek consolation and happiness from creatures, are always discontented, while they who practice the greatest mortification enjoy continual peace. Let us, then, be pursuaded that neither pleasures of sense, nor honours, nor riches, nor the world with all its goods, can make us happy. God alone can content the heart of man. Whoever finds him, possesses all things. Hence, St. Scholastica said, that if men knew the peace which religious enjoy in retirement, the entire world would become one great convent; and St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, used to say, that they would abandon the delights of the world, and force their way into religion. Hence, also, St. Laurence Justinian says, that "God has designedly concealed the happiness of the religious state, because if it were known, all would relinquish the world and fly to religion."

17. The very solitude, silence and tranquillity of the cloister, give to a soul that loves God a foretaste of paradise. Father Charles of Lorena, a Jesuit of royal extraction, used to say, that the peace which he enjoyed during a single moment in his cell, was an abundant remuneration for the sacrifice he had made in quitting the world. Such was the happiness which he occasionally experienced in his cell that he would sometimes exult and dance with joy. Blessed Seraphina of Ascoli, a Capuchin, was in the habit of saying that he would not give one inch of his cord for all the kingdoms of the earth. Arnolf, a Cistercian, comparing the riches and honours of the court which he had left with the consolations which he found in religion, exclaimed: "How faithfully fulfilled, O Jesus, is the promise which you made of rendering a hundredfold to him who leaves all things for your sake." St. Bernard's monks who led lives of great penance and austerities, received in their solitude such spiritual delights that they were afraid they should obtain in this life the reward of their labours. Let it be your care to unite yourself closely to God; to embrace with peace all the crosses he sends you; to love what is most perfect; and, when necessary, to do violence to yourself. And that you may be able to accomplish all this, pray continually; pray in your meditations, in your communions, in your visits to the Blessed Sacrament, and especially when you are tempted by the devil; and you shall obtain a place in the number of those fervent souls who are more happy and content than all the princesses, and queens, and empresses of the earth.

18. Beg of God to give you the spirit of a perfect religious; that spirit which impels the soul to act, not according to the dictates of nature, but according to the motions of grace, or from the sole motive of pleasing God. Why wear the habit of a religious if in the heart and soul you be a secular, and live according to the maxims of the world? Whosoever profanes the garb of religion by a worldly spirit and a worldly life, has an apostate heart. "To maintain," says St. Bernard, "a secular spirit under the habit of religion, is apostacy of heart"—Ser. 5, Ps. xc. The spirit of a religious, then, implies an exact obedience to the rules and to the directions of the superior, along with a great zeal for the interests of religion. Some religious wish to become saints, but only according to their own caprice; that is, by long silence, prayer, and spiritual reading, without being employed in any of the offices of the community. Hence, if they are sent to the turn, to the door, or to other distracting occupations, they become impatient; they complain, and sometimes obstinately refuse to obey, saying that such offices are to them occasions of sin. Oh! such is not the spirit of a religious. Surely what is conformable to the will of God cannot hurt the soul. The spirit of a religious requires a total detachment from commerce with the world; great love and effection for prayer, for silence, and for recollection; ardent zeal for exact obedience; deep abhorrence of sensual indulgence; intense charity towards all men; and finally, a love of God capable of subduing and of ruling all the passions. Such is the spirit of a perfect religious. Whosoever does not possess this spirit, should, at least, desire it ardently, should do violence to herself, and earnestly beg God's assistance to obtain it. In a word, the spirit of a religious supposes a total disengagement of the heart from everything which is not God, and a perfect consecration of the soul to him, and to him alone.

19. Seventh — "Moritur confidentius."—"A religious dies more confidently." Some are deterred from entering religion by the apprehension that their abandoment of the world might be afterwards to them a source of regret. But in making choice of a state of life, I would advise such persons to reflect, not on the pleasures of this life, but on the hour of death, which will determine their happiness or misery for all eternity. And I would ask if, in the world surrounded by seculars, disturbed by the fondness of children, from whom they are about to be separated for ever, perplexed with the care of their worldly affairs, and disturbed by a thousand scruples of conscience, they can expect to die more contented than in the house of God, assisted by their holy companions, who continually speak of God: who pray for them, and console and encourage them in their passage to eternity? Imagine, you see on the one hand, a princess dying, in a splendid palace, attended by a retinue of servants, surrounded by her husband, her children, and relations; and represent to yourself, on the other a religious expiring in her convent, in a poor cell, mortified, humble, far from her relatives, stripped of property and self-will; and tell me which of the two, the rich princess or poor nun, dies most contented. Ah! the enjoyment of riches, of honours, and pleasures in this life, do not afford consolation at the hour of death, but rather beget grief and diffidence of salvation; while poverty, humiliations, penitential austerities, and detachment from the world, render death sweet and amiable, and give to a Christian increased hopes of attaining that true felicity which shall never terminate.

20. Jesus Christ has promised that whosoever leaves his house and relatives for God's sake, shall enjoy eternal life. "And every one that hath left house, or brethern, or sisters, or father, or mother, or lands, for my sake, shall receive a hundred-fold, and shall possess life everlasting"—Matt. xix. 29. A certain religious, of the Society of Jesus being observed to smile on his death-bed, some of his brethren who were present began to apprehend that he was not aware of his danger, and asked him why he smiled; he answered: "Why should I not smile, since I am sure of paradise? Has not the Lord himself promised to give eternal life to those who leave the world for his sake? I have long since abandoned all things for love of him; he cannot violate his own promises. I smile, then, because I confidently expect eternal glory." The same sentiment was expressed long before by St. John Chrysostom, writing to a certain religious: "God," says the saint, "cannot tell a lie, but he has promised eternal life to those who leave the goods of this world. You have left all these things; why, then, should you doubt the fulfilment of his promise?"—S. Chrysos. lib. de Prov.

21. St. Bernard says that "it is very easy to pass from the cell to heaven, because a person who dies in a cell scarcely ever descends into hell, since it seldom happens that a religious perseveres in her cell till death, unless she be predestined to happiness"—S. Bern. trac. de vita solit. Hence, St. Laurence Justinian says religion is the gate of paradise; because living in religion, and partaking of its advantages, is a great mark of election to glory.—Cap. 7, de discip. mon. No wonder, then, that Gerard, the brother of St. Bernard, when dying in his monastry, began to sing with joy and gladness. God himself says: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord"—Ap. xiv. 13. And surely religious, who, by the holy vows, and especially by the vow of obedience, or total renunciation of self-will, die to the world and to themselves, must be ranked amongst the number of those who "die in the Lord." Hence, Father Suarez, remembering at the hour of death that all his actions in religion were performed through obedience, was filled with spiritual joy, and exclaimed that he could not imagine death could be so sweet and so full of consolation.

22. Eighth.—"Purgatur citius."—"A religious is purged more quickly." St. Thomas teaches, that the perfect consecration which a religious makes of herself to God by her solemn profession, remits the guilt and punishment of her past sins. "But," he says, (2. 2 q. ult. a. 3, ad. 3) "it may be reasonably said that a person, by entering into religion, obtains the remission of all sins. For to make satisfaction for all sins, it is sufficient to dedicate oneself entirely to the service of God by entering religion, which dedication exceeds all manner of satisfaction. Hence," he concludes, "we read in the lives of the fathers that they who enter into religion obtain the same grace as those who receive baptism." The defects committed, after profession, by a good religious, are expiated in this world, by her daily exercises of piety, by her meditations, communions, and mortifications. But if a religious should not make full atonement in this life for all her sins, her purgatory will not be of long duration. The many sacrifices which are offered for her after death, and the prayers of the community, will soon release her from her sufferings.

23. Ninth.—"Remuneratur copiosius."—"A religious is more abundantly rewarded." Worldlings are blind to the things of God; they do not comprehend the happiness of eternal glory, in comparison of which the pleasures of this world are but wretchedness and misery. If they had just notions, and a lively sense of the glory of paradise, they would assuredly abandon their possessions—even kings would abdicate their crowns, and, quitting the world, in which, it is exceedingly difficult to attend to the one thing necessary, they would retire into the cloister to secure their eternal salvation. Bless, then, dear sister, and continually thank your God, who by his own lights and graces has delivered you from the bondage of Egypt, and brought you to his own house; prove your gratitude by fidelity in his service, and by a faithful correspondence with so great a grace. Compare all the goods of this world with the eternal felicity which God has prepared for those who leave all things for his sake, and you will find that there is a greater disparity between the transitory joys of this life and the eternal beatitude of the saints, than there is between a grain of sand and the entire creation.

24. Jesus Christ has promised that whosoever shall leave all things for his sake shall receive a hundred-fold in this life, and eternal glory in the next. Can you doubt his words? Can you imagine that he will not be faithful to his promise? Is he not more liberal in rewarding virtue than in punishing vice? If they who give a cup of cold water in his name shall not be left without abundant remuneration (St. Mark, ix. 40,) how great and incomprehensible must be the reward which a religious, who aspires to perfection, shall receive for the numberless works of piety which she performs every day—for so many meditations, offices, and spiritual lectures?—for so many acts of mortification and of divine love which she daily refers to God's honour? Do you not know that these good works which are performed through obedience, and in compliance with the religious vows, merit a far greater reward than the good works of seculars? Brother Lacci, of the Society of Jesus, appeared after death to a certain person, and said that he and King Philip the Second were crowned with bliss, but that his own glory as far surpassed that of Philip as the exalted dignity of an earthly sovereign is raised above the lowly station of an humble religious.

25. The dignity of martyrdom is sublime; but the religious state appears to possess something still more excellent. The martyr suffers that he may not lose his soul; the religious, to render herself more acceptable to God. A martyr dies for the faith ; a religious for perfection. Although the religious state has lost much of its primitive splendour, we may still say, with truth, that the souls who are most dear to God, who have attained the greatest perfection, and who edify the Church by the odour of their sanctity, are, for the most part, to be found in religion. How few are there in the world, even amongst the most fervent, who rise at midnight to pray and sing the praises of God ? How few who spend five and six hours each day in these or similar works of piety ?—who practise fasting, abstinence, and mortification ? How few who observe silence, or accustom themselves to do the will of others rather than their own ? And, surely, all these are performed by the religious of every order ; even in convents where the discipline is relaxed, many are found who, on the day of judgment, will condemn the others, who aspire to perfection, observe the rules, and perform in private many works of supererogation. It is evident that the conduct of the generality of pious Christians in the world cannot be compared with that of good religious. No wonder, then, that St. Cyprian called virgins consecrated to God, the flower of the garden of the Church, and the noblest portion of the flock of Jesus Christ.—Lib. de hab. Virg. St. Gregory Nazianzen says the religious "are the first fruits of the flock of the Lord, the pillars and crown of faith, and the pearls of the Church"—Orat. ult. in Jul. I hold as certain that the greater number of the seraphic thrones, vacated by the unhappy associates of Lucifer, will be filled by religious. Out of the sixty who, during the last century, were enrolled in the catalogue of saints, or honoured with the appellation of blessed, all, with the exception of five or six, belonged to the religious orders. Jesus Christ once said to St. Teresa : "Woe to the world but for religious" —Riber. Lib. i., vit. c. 12. Ruffinus says : "It cannot be doubted that the world is preserved from ruin by the merits of religious"—Ruffin. Prol. in vita Patr. When, then, the devil affrights you by representing the difficulty of observing your rule and practising the self-denial and the austerities necessary for salvation, raise your eyes to heaven, and the hope of eternal beatitude will give you strength and courage to suffer all things. The trials, mortifications, and all miseries of this life, will soon be past, and to them will succeed the ineffable delights of paradise, which shall be enjoyed for eternity without fear of failure or of diminution.

PRAYER.

O God of my soul, I know that thou dost most earnestly desire to save me. By my sins I had incurred the sentence of eternal condemnation; but, instead of casting me into hell, as I deserved, thou hast stretched forth thy loving hand, and not only delivered me from hell and sin, but thou hast also drawn me, as it were by force, from amidst the dangers of the world, and placed me in thy own house amongst thy own spouses. I hope, O my spouse, to be admitted one day into heaven, there to sing for eternity the great mercies thou hast shown me. Oh! that I had never offended thee. O Jesus, assist me, now that I desire to love thee with my whole soul, and wish to do everything in my power to please thee. Thou hast spared nothing in order to gain my love: it is but just that I devote my entire being to thy service. Thou hast given thyself entirely to me: I give myself without reserve to thee.

Since my soul is immortal, I desire to be eternally united to thee. And, if it is love which unites the soul with thee, I love thee, O my Sovereign Good; I love thee, my Redeemer; I love thee, O my Spouse, my only treasure and object of my love: I love thee! I love thee! and hope that I shall love thee for eternity. Thy merits, O my Redeemer, are the grounds of my hope. In thy protection also, O great mother of God, my mother, Mary, do I place unbounded confidence. Thou didst obtain pardon for me when I was in the state of sin: now that I hope that I am in the state of grace, and am a religious, wilt thou not obtain for me the grace to become a saint? Such is my ardent hope, my fervent desire. Amen.

CHAPTER III.

A Religious should belong entirely to God.

PLUTARCH relates (Quest. Rom. 49,) that in Rome it was the duty of a woman, on her first arrival at the house of her husband, to address him in the following words: "Wherever you are, there also shall I be. Wheresoever your will leads you, there likewise my desires shall carry me." It is this perfect conformity of her will with his that Jesus Christ demands of every virgin who aspires to the dignity and glory of his spouse. "My son," he says, "give me thy heart"—Prov. xxiii. 26. My child and my spouse, what I desire from you is, that you give me your heart, your affections, and your will. The Holy Ghost says, that "when God created our first parents, Adam and Eve, he set his eyes upon their hearts"—Eccl. xvii. 7. He fixed his eyes not upon their hands, but upon their hearts; because external works are of no value before God, unless they proceed from the heart, and be accompanied by the affections of the soul. All the glory of the spouse of Christ consists in an entire and perfect union of her heart with the heart of God. "All the glory of the king's daughter is within"—Ps. xliv. This union of her interier makes a religious belong entirely to the Lord.

2. "God," says St. Bernard, "requires to be feared as a sovereign, to be honoured as a father, and to be loved as a spouse"—Ser. 83, in Cant. Hence, in his virginal spouses, the Redeemer bears more patiently with every imperfection than with a divided heart or a want of love. It was to show the necessity of a complete and unqualified dedication of themselves to his glory that he ordained, by his Church, that, in receiving the sacred veil on the day of their profession, his spouses should be reminded of their obligation to reject every other lover. "Receive," the bishop says, "the veil, that you may admit no lover but him." Receive this veil that you may no longer have regard to creatures, and that you may banish from your heart every affection which is not for God. The Church commands religious, at their profession, to change their name, that they may forget the world; that they may esteem themselves dead to all earthly things, and that the dispositions of their souls may correspond with the words which they utter on that solemn occasion: "The empire of the world and all the grandeur of the earth I have despised for the love of my Lord Jesus Christ, whom I have seen, whom I have loved, in whom I have believed, towards whom my heart inclineth." I have despised the world and all its pomps for the sake of Jesus, my spouse, to whom, because he is most amiable and most worthy of my love, I have consecrated all the affections of my heart. Every religious should say to the world, with St. Agnes: "Depart from me, food for death, for I am pledged to another lover." Whenever any earthly object steals into her heart, and claims a share in that love what had been entirely consecrated to her Divine Spouse, she should exclaim: "Begone, pernicious affection, you seek to poison my heart; depart, therefore; for another lover, more noble, more faithful, and more acceptable than you, has loved me before I could love him, and has taken possession of my whole soul. You are a vile and miserable creature; but my spouse is the Lord, the king of heaven and earth. I am espoused to him whom the angels serve."

3. Without love the soul of man cannot exist. Her affections must be fixed on God or on creatures; if she loves not creatures, she will certainly love God. Hence, the Holy Ghost exhorts us to guard our hearts with the utmost vigilance against all affections which have not God for their object: "With all watchfulness keep thy heart, because life issueth out from it"—Prov. iv. 23. While the heart loves God the soul shall have life; but if the heart transfer its affections to creatures, spiritual death will be the inevitable consequence. In order, then, to become a saint, the spouse of the Lamb must expel from her soul whatsoever has not God for its end and object. When any one demanded admission into the Society of the Fathers of the Desert, they answered him by the following question: "Do you bring a vacant heart, that it may be filled by the Holy Ghost?" Justly did they require a soul detached from earthly goods; for a heart in which the world dwells cannot be replenished with the love of God. Whoever brings to the fountain a vessel replete with sand will labour in vain to fill it with water, unless it be first emptied of its contents. O my God, why do so many religious frequent the holy exercises of prayer and communion, and draw from them so little increase of divine love? It is because their hearts are so full of the world, of self-esteem, of vanity, or of self-will, of affection to friends, attachment to creatures. Until the world is rooted out of their hearts, the love of God cannot take possession of their souls. Give me a religious who is detached from the world, and the things of the world, and I pledge myself that divine love shall abound in her soul. To obtain this detachment from the earth it is necessary to call continually on the Lord, in the language of holy David: "Create in me a clean heart, O God"—Ps. 1. Give me, O Lord, a heart free from every affection which does not proceed from the love of thee. "Woe to them that are of a double heart"—Eccl. ii. 14. "Woe," says St. Augustine, in his comment on these words, "to them who divide their heart, giving it partly to God and partly to the devil"—De subst. dilec. Num. 4. For, continues the saint, the anger of God is justly provoked against those who treat him and his sworn enemy with equal attention; and therefore he departs from them, and yields to the devil the undivided possession of their hearts: "God is angry because, in the affections of a double heart, he is associated with the devil; he departs, and the devil possesses the whole"—Ibid. The holy doctor then concludes that, because a soul loves God less in proportion as her affections are fixed on other objects, a religious cannot be entirely devoted to the love of her spouse while she is attached to creatures. "He loves you less who loves anything else with you"—Ibid.

4. In a word, every little attachment to created objects impedes the perfect consecration of the soul to God. St. Teresa, while she cherished a certain little inordinate, though not an unchaste affection for a relative, was but imperfectly united to God; but when she afterwards disengaged her heart from all earthly attachments, and consecrated her whole soul to the love of Jesus, she merited to hear from him: "Teresa, now thou art all mine, and I am all thine." St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say that a religious, who gives not to Jesus her whole heart, gives him nothing. The assertion was most just; for, it is impossible to divide a heart, too small to love a God who deserves infinite love, and to give one part of it to him and another to creatures. No, says blessed Egidius, "Una Uni;" the soul, which is one, must be entirely given to him, who is one, who merits all our love, and who has done and suffered so much to extort our love. "Surely," observes Father Nierembergh, "it was not necessary for our redemption that Jesus Christ should have submitted to all the miseries and endured all the pains of his life and death. A single drop of his blood, a tear, a prayer, would have been sufficient to save the whole world and an infinite number of worlds. But the Son of God has shed the last drop of his blood, and has given his life, not only to redeem us, but also to compel us to love him with our whole hearts. He could have sent an angel to deliver us from sin; "but," says Hugh of St. Victor, "lest you should divide your love between the creator and the redeeming angel, he who was your Creator has chosen to become your Redeemer"—In Lib. Sent.

5. The Lord commands all to love him with their whole hearts. To each one he says: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart"—Matt. xxii. 37. This precept of love is especially directed to the spouses of the Redeemer. A brother in religion said once to the venerable Father John Joseph of Alcantara, that he had become a religious to save his soul. The venerable Father replied: "My child, do not say that you have left the world to secure your salvation; say rather that you have entered religion to become a saint, for the object of a religious should be to love God in the highest degree." O my God, if a religious love not Jesus Christ with her whole soul, to whom will she give the preference in her heart? Oh! how many marks of predilection must he have shown to you in making you his spouse in religion? He must, first, have selected you for creation from among an infinite number of possible beings. Then, to make you from your birth a child of the Church, by the holy sacrament of baptism, he must have chosen you from among so many millions who are born in infidelity and heresy. Lastly, in bringing you into religion by his lights, his invitations, and by his special graces, he must have preferred you before the numberless multitudes of seculars, whom he has left in the world in the midst of so many dangers and occasions of losing their immortal souls. Now, if you do not love your God with your whole heart and soul; if you do not consecrate your entire being to his service, to whom will you give your heart? "This," says the Psalmist, "is the generation of them that seek the Lord"—Ps. xxiii. 6. Who can behold virgins of noble birth and splendid fortunes despising the pomp and pleasures of the world, which they might have enjoyed, and shutting themselves up in a convent to live in poverty and abjection; who I say, can behold these holy virgins without exclaiming: "This is the generation of them that seek the Lord?"

6. Since, then, God has called you to be his spouse, all your thoughts and affections must be fixed on him, and on him alone. "Have no connection," says St. Bernard, "with the world; forget all things; reserve yourself for him alone whom you have chosen from among all"—S. Ber. Serm. 40, in Cant. Now that you are consecrated to Jesus Christ, what have you to do with the world? Forget all things, and endeavour to preserve your whole heart for that God who has chosen you for his spouse, in preference to so many others. You must give him your whole heart; for Jesus Christ requires that his spouse be an enclosed garden, a sealed fountain. "My spouse is a garden enclosed, a fountain sealed up"—Cant. iv. 12. The spouse of Jesus must be an enclosed garden, admitting into her heart no lover but Jesus. "An enclosed garden," says Gilbert, "which admits none but her beloved"—Ser. 35, in Cant. She must be a sealed up fountain, for he is a jealous spouse, who will suffer no one to share in the affections of his beloved. "Put me," he says, "as a seal upon thy heart; as a seal upon thy arm; for love is as strong as death"—Cant. viii. 6. I desire to be placed as a seal upon your heart and upon your arm, that you may love none but me, and that my glory may be the sole object of all your actions. "The beloved," says St. Gregory, "is put as a seal upon the heart and arm of the spouse; because, in a holy soul, the intensity of her love is shown by the affections of the will, and by the works of her hands." Oh! how love, when it is strong, banishes from the soul every affection which is not for God: "For love is as strong as death." As no created power can avert the stroke of death when the hour of dissolution arrives, so there is no obstacle which a soul, filled with divine love, will not overcome. "If a man should give all the substance of his house for love, he shall despise it as nothing"—Cant. viii. 7. A heart which loves God despises all that the world can give, and disregards all that is not God. "When," says St. Francis of Sales, "a house takes fire, the furniture is thrown out through the windows; and when a soul burns with divine love, she, without the aid of sermons, or spiritual reading, or the exhortations of directors, divests herself of all affection for creatures, to possess and to love her only Supreme Good, the God of Majesty and Sovereign of the universe."

7. Perhaps, dear sister, so much love is not due to your spouse, Jesus, who died upon the cross for your redemption, who has given you himself so often in the holy communion, and has enriched your soul with so many special graces which have not been granted to others. "Reflect," says St. John Chrysostom, "that he has given you himself entirely and without reserve. He has given all to you; he has reserved nothing for himself." This consideration was one of the principal means by which St. Bernard enkindled in his soul the flame of divine love. "He," says the saint, "was given to me entirely; he was wholly consumed for my benefit." My Saviour has given me his adorable divinity and his sacred humanity; he has become a whole burnt offering for my sake; can I refuse to consecrate my entire being to his love? "My beloved to me, and I to him"—Cant. ii. 16. My beloved has given himself entirely to me; it is but just that I dedicate to him my soul, my body, my life, and all my possessions. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that a religious being called to be the spouse of a crucified God, should, in her whole life and in all her actions, have in view no object but Jesus crucified; and should, in her whole life, have no other occupation than the continual meditation of the eternal love which her divine spouse bore to her. When Jesus was about to accomplish the redemption of man, he said: "Now shall the prince of this world be cast out"—John xii. 31. Perhaps by these words the Son of God meant, that after his crucifixion the devil was to be banished from the earth? "No," says St. Augustine, "but from the hearts of the faithful" —Tract 4, in Ep. ad Jo. Now, if Jesus Christ has died for all, he has suffered in a special manner for his virginal spouses. Since, then, a God has given himself entirely for your salvation, would it not be enormous ingratitude in you to refuse to him the sacrifice of your whole heart, or to love him only with reserve? Say, then, frequently to your spouse: O my Jesus, you have given yourself to me without reserve; you have given all your blood, all your labours, all your merits, for my sanctification. In a word, your favours were so abundant and magnificent that nothing more remained to be conferred upon me. I therefore give myself entirely to you; I offer to you all that I possess, or shall ever possess upon earth; I consecrate to you all my pleasures, my body, my soul, my will, my liberty. I have nothing more to present to you: if I had, you should have it. I renounce all that the world can give, and declare that you alone can satisfy the desires of my heart. "Oh!" said St. Teresa, "what a profitable exchange to give our hearts to God, and, in return, to be made the objects of his love." "But," continues the saint, "because we do not offer to him the undivided affections of our souls, he does not bestow upon us all the treasures of his love."

8. The spouse of Jesus should sing no other than that canticle of love recommended by holy David: "Sing to the Lord a new canticle"—Ps. xcvii. 1. "What," says St. Augustine, "is a new canticle but new love?"—Serm. 256, de temp. The bygone canticles are those affections to creatures and to ourselves, to which we have been subject from our birth, and which continually spring up from the inclinations to evil, transmitted to us by our first parents. "For," says the Holy Ghost, "the imagination and thought of man's heart are prone to evil from his youth"—Gen. viii. 21. But the new canticle is love, by which the soul is consecrated to God. "The voice," says St. Augustine, "of this singer of canticles is the voice of holy love: let us love him for his own sake." The voice of the soul praising God is the fervour of charity which makes her love him, because he merits her love, and banishes from her affections whatever is not God. Jesus crucified commands his spouses to be crucified to all earthly things. Whenever, then, the world places before your eyes its pomps and delights, you should exclaim with St. Paulinus: "Let the rich enjoy their treasures, and kings their thrones; Christ is our kingdom and our glory." His love is more valuable to us than the sovereignty of the earth. The spouse of Jesus should do nothing but love; should live but for love; should seek only to advance continually in love: she should incessantly languish with love, in the choir, in the cell, the dormitory, the garden, in all places. Such should be the ardour of her charity that the flames of her love would extend to all parts of the convent, and even beyond the boundaries of the enclosure.

To this love the Apostle exhorts and invites her, by the example of her beloved spouse. Happy the religious who can say with St. Francis, "My God and my all." My God, who hast shown to me such an excess of love, why should I seek earthly possessions? I have found thee, the source of all happiness. My God and my all, I care not for honours, for riches, or for pleasures. Thou art my glory, my treasure, my delight, and my all. "What have I in heaven? and besides thee what do I desire upon earth? Thou art the God of my heart, and the God that is my portion for ever"—Ps. lxxii. 25, 26. Can I, O my God, find any one in heaven or on earth who is so deserving of my affection, or who has done so much to gain my love? Thou alone shalt be the Lord of my heart; thou shalt reign in its affections, and shalt rule its motions with sovereign sway. Thee alone shall my soul obey, seeking in all things thy holy will. "I found him whom my soul loveth; I held him and will not let him go"—Cant. iii. 4. Yes, I have found the object of all my affections; I have found him who alone can make me happy. Though the world, with all its pleasures, and hell, with all its powers of darkness, should endeavor to separate me from thee, I will not abandon thee, O Jesus, my spouse. "I held him, and will not let him go." I will hold thee fast by my love, and will never suffer thee to depart from me. I desire to live and to die always, and in all things, united to thee.

9. To attain perfection, and to enjoy true peace of conscience, it is necessary to die to the world and to self. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord"—Apoc. xiv. 13. As corporal death is necessarily accompanied with pain, so abandonment of the world, and detachment from its pleasures, is impossible without trials and sufferings. The kingdom of heaven is represented to us in Holy Scripture under various images. It is sometimes compared to a treasure which can be obtained only by selling all our possessions; sometimes to a city, which, because the gate is narrow, no one can enter with fatigue and industry; sometimes to a palace, in which the stones (that is, the souls of which it is composed) must be polished with the utmost care; sometimes to a feast, to which no one is admitted unless he abandon all other concerns; sometimes to a prize which cannot be won without running to the end; and, finally, to a crown, for the acquisition of which it is necessary to fight and conquer. In a word, to die to the world, self-love must die in the soul. St. Augustine says, that the love of God increases in proportion as self-love is diminished; and that the destruction of the latter is the perfection of the former.

"The diminution of cupidity," says the holy doctor, "is the nutriment of charity ; but its total absence is the perfection of charity"—Lib. 81, p. 36. Charity is estimated, not by its tenderness, but by its strength. Ardent charity smooths every asperity and surmounts every obstacle. "There is nothing," says St. Augustine, "so difficult which the fire of love does not conquer"—In Joan. tract. xlviii. 3. In another place he says : "In what we love there is no labour ; or if there be, we love the very labour itself"—De Bono Viduit. cap. 21. In a soul that loves God, torments endured for his sake excite no pain ; or if they do, these pains are a source of happiness and delight. In his Confessions, the saint writes, that when he gave himself entirely to God, the very privation of sensual gratifications filled his soul with joy ; and that though at first he dreaded their loss, he afterwards had reason to rejoice at their relinquishment. "How sweet, on a sudden, was it become to me without these joys ! and what I was before so much afraid to lose I now cast from me with joy"—Lib. 9, cap. 1, num. 2. To a religious who has fixed her heart on God, the practice of poverty, of obedience, mortification, and of all virtues, is easy and agreeable ; but to her whose affections are divided between God and creatures, the duties of religion are an intolerable burden.

10. It is true that whatever good we do comes from God, and that without his grace we cannot, according to the Apostle, even pronounce the name of Jesus. But notwithstanding our absolute dependence of divine grace, God commands us to perform our part, and to co-operate with him in the work of our salvation. Many desire to become saints, but wish that God would do all, and that he would bring them to eternal glory without labor or inconvenience to them. But this is impossible. The law of God is said to be a yoke borne by two, to show that the divine aid, on the one hand, and our co-operation on the other, are indispensable for its observance. And sometimes, to carry this yoke, and merit everlasting happiness, we must do violence to the feelings of flesh and blood. "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent bear it away"—Matt. xi. 12. And St. Paul says, that the crown of life shall be given to him only who shall combat till he overcomes the enemies of his salvation. And, O spouse of Jesus, I say to you with the same Apostle, "hold fast that which thou hast, that no man take thy crown"—Apoc. iii. 11. Since Jesus Christ has made you his spouse, do not allow your enemies to snatch from you the dignity of queen, which he has prepared for you in his kingdom ; but, on the contrary, hold fast your crown, by assimilating yourself to your beloved, the predestined model of the elect: "For, whom he foreknew, he also predestined to be made conformable to the image of his Son"—Rom. viii. 29. He has gone before you, crowned with thorns, scourged at a pillar, loaded with the cross, and saturated with contempt and reproach; and in that pitiable condition he invites you to follow him, and to deny yourself: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me"—Matt. xvi. 24. He has died for you, and it is your duty to sacrifice your life for him, and to say with the seraphic St. Francis: "O good Jesus, may I die for the love of thee, who hast condescended to die for the love of me." Yes, it is but just that you die to yourselves, and live only for that God who has died for your salvation. "That they also," says the Apostle, "who live, may not now live to themselves, but unto him who died for them"—2 Cor. v. 15. You, indeed, are weak; but if you trust in the goodness of your spouse, his grace and strength will prepare you to excute so arduous a task. When the devil molests you, and endeavours to cast you into despair, by representing the difficulties and miseries of a life of continual mortification, of incessant self-denial, and of perpetual abstinence from sensual pleasures, answer him in the words of the Apostle: "I can do all things in him who strengthenth me"—Phil. iv. 13. Of myself I can do nothing; but the Lord, who has chosen me for his spouse, and called me to his love, will give me courage and strength to walk in the path of his commandments. "If," says St. Teresa, "we be not in fault, God will assuredly, by his all-powerful aid, enable us to become saints." And, O my God, upon whom, if not upon your spouses, will the obligation of sanctity be imperative? O consecrated virgins, offer yourselves frequently to God, with a strong desire and determination to please him in all things, and implore continually the assistance of his holy grace. He has promised to grant whatsoever is asked of him with confidence. "All things whatsoever you ask, when ye pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come unto you"—Mark xi. 34.

11. What then do you fear? Have courage; God has taken you from the world; he has delivered you from its snares; has called you to his love; and has, if you be faithful to him, prepared for you numberless helps and graces. You have already left the world; "you have," as St. Teresa used to say to her spiritual children, "taken the most difficult and important step; and to become a saint little now remains to be done. Resolve, then, at once to disolve every worldly attachment. Perhaps, after having forsaken the world, and renounced all its goods, after having voluntarily relinquished your liberty, and bound yourself, by vow, to perpetual enclosure ; perhaps, after all these sacrifices, you are disposed, for the miserable gratifications of sense or caprice, to risk your all—the possession of paradise and of God—and to prefer, before the exalted glory of spouse of the Most High, the unhappy slavery of Satan, who will render you unhappy in this life and eternally miserable in the next? Resolve, then, I say again, to burst every earthly tie, and tremble lest the words which you now read should be the last invitation of your spouse. Do not resist the voice of God any longer. If you neglect his call on this occasion, he may, perhaps, abandon you for ever. Resolve, then, resolve! "The devil," says St. Teresa, "is afraid of resolute souls." St. Bernard teaches, that many souls are lost through want of fortitude. Take courage, then, and trust in the power and goodness of God: strong resolutions overcome all difficulties. Oh! happy, thrice happy soul, if, in obedience to the voice of God, you give yourself entirely to your spouse, Jesus. When death approaches you can return thanks to him for his favours, and address him in the words of the glorious St. Agnes : "O Lord, who hast taken from me the love of the world, receive my soul." O my God, who hast disengaged my heart from creatures, that all its affections might be fixed on thee, receive, now, my soul, that I may be admitted into the kingdom of thy glory, to love thee with all my strength, without fear of ever being separated from thee—the Supreme and Infinite Good!

12. Oh! that all religious would imitate the example of the venerable Frances Farnese. Her life, at first, was very imperfect, but, happening one day to read the history of the Franciscans in Japan, she was suddenly seized with compunction, and exclaimed: "And what my sisters will we do?" We have forsaken our families and our goods, and shall we now draw down upon our souls the vengeance of God and the sentence of eternal death, by attachment to the things of the world which we do not possess?" From that moment she resolved to give up the world, and to consecrate herself entirely to God. This resolution she fulfilled in accomplishment of that wonderful reformation of the order, which was planned and executed by her directions. "Men," says St. Jerome, "always seek to advance in the knowledge of their secular profession, but are satiated with the mere rudiments of the science of the Saints." "In all their worldly pursuits," says the Saint, "men are never satiated; but in virtue it is sufficient for them to have a beginning"—Epis. ad Demet. Every Christian is bound to tend to perfection. "When I speak of a Christian," says St. Ambrose, "I mean a perfect man"—Ser. 12 in Ps. cxviii. The precept by which all are commanded to love God with all their strength, imposes upon all the obligation of perfection. Besides, to discharge the duty of preserving sanctifying grace, it is necessary to struggle always to perfect charity in the soul; for, in the path of virtue, he that does not advance recedes, and exposes himself to the danger of sin. Now, if this is true with regard to all Christians, how much more so with regard to religious, who are bound by a stricter obligation to seek perfection, not only because they receive more abundant graces and more powerful helps to sanctity, but also because they have promised to observe the vows and rules of religion.

13. But to fulfil the command by which you are obliged to aspire to perfection, an inefficacious and fruitless desire of sanctity is not sufficient. You must do violence to yourself, and adopt the means of attaining perfection. It will not be necessary for you to undertake extraordinary things it will be sufficient to perform your ordinary exercises with diligence and attention, to observe your rule with exactness, and to practise with fidelity, the Gospel virtues. However, a religious, who desires to become a saint, will not confine herself to the mere discharge of the duties prescribed by her rule, which is accommodated to weak as well as to perfect souls; she must also perform supererogatory works of prayer, of charity, of mortification, and of the other virtues. St. Bernard says, that "what is perfect must be singular." A religious who barely discharges the ordinary duties of the community will never attain sublime sanctity. It is your duty, then, to do violence to yourself, and courageously to adopt the means of arriving at perfection.

14. The principal means are: First, an ardent desire to become a Saint. Second, great confidence in Jesus Christ and his holy mother. Third, to avoid every deliberate sin or defect, and after a fault not to lose courage, but to make an act of contrition for it, and then resume your ordinary occupations. Fourth, to cut off all attachment to creatures, to self-will and self-esteem. Fifth, to resist continually your own inclinations. Sixth, to observe exactly the rules of religion, however unimportant they may appear. Seventh, to perform your ordinary duties with all possible perfection. Eight, to communicate often—with the permission of your director; to make long and frequent meditations, and to perform all mortifications which he will permit. Ninth, to prefer, on all occasions, those actions which are most agreeable to God and most opposed to self-love. Tenth, to receive all crosses and contradictions with joy and gladness from the hands of God. Eleventh, to love and serve those who persecute you. Twelfth, to spend every moment of your time for God. Thirteenth, to offer God all your actions, in union with the merits of Jesus Christ. Fourteenth, to make a special oblation of yourself to God, that he may dispose of you, and of all you possess, in whatever way he pleases. Fifteenth, to protest continually before God that his pleasure and love are the only objects of your wishes. Sixteenth, lastly, and above all, to pray continually, and to reccommend yourself with unbounded confidence to Jesus Christ and to his virgin mother and to entertain a special affection and tenderness towards Mary. I conclude with the words which the venerable Father Antony Torres, after an ecstasy of love, addressed to a religious who was one of his penitents: "My child love your spouse, who is the only object that merits your love."

PRAYER.

O my God! O Amiable Love! O Infinite Lover! and worthy of infinite love, when shall I love thee as thou hast loved me? It is not in thy power to give me stronger proofs of love than those thou hast already given. Thou hast spared nothing; thou hast expended thy blood and thy life to oblige me to love thee; and shall I love thee only with reserve? Pardon me, O my Jesus, if in my past life I have been so ungrateful as to prefer my accursed pleasures before the love which I owe to thee. Ah, my Lord and my spouse, discover to me always, more and more, thy infinite loveliness, that I may be daily more enamoured of thy perfection, and that I may continually endeavour to please thee as thou dost dost deserve to be pleased. Thou dost command me to love thee, and I desire nothing but thy love. "Speak Lord, for thy servant heareth." Speak O Lord: tell me what thou desirest from me: my wish is to obey thee in all things, I will no longer resist the graces and mercies thou hast bestowed upon me. Thou hast given thyself entirely to me: I offer myself without reserve to thee. For thy mercy's sake accept, and do not refuse this oblation. By my infidelities I have deserved to be cast away from thy love; but the desire to be thine, which thou hast infused into my soul, assures me that thou hast already accepted my offer. I love thee, O God, who art infinitely amiable: I love thee, O Sovereign Good

Thou art, and shalt be for ever, the only delight of my heart and the sole object of my affections. And since thou hast said, "Ask, and you shall receive," and hast promised to grant whatsoever we ask, I beg, with St. Ignatius, that "Thou will give me only thy love along with thy grace, and I shall be sufficiently rich." Give me thy love and thy grace; grant that I may love thee and be beloved by thee, and I shall desire nothing else from thee. O Mary, who belonged always and entirely to God, by that love which our Lord bore thee through all eternity, obtain for us the grace henceforth to love God, and to love him alone. Amen.

CHAPTER IV.

On the desire of Perfection.

An ardent desire of perfection is the first means which a religious should adopt, in order to acquire sanctity and to consecrate her whole being to God. As the sportsman to hit a bird in flight, must take aim in advance of his prey, so a Christian, to make progress in virtue, should aspire to the highest degree of holiness which it is in his power to attain. "Who," says holy David, "will give me wings like a dove, and I will fly and be at rest?"—Ps. liv. 7. Who will give me the wings of the dove to fly to my God, and, divested of all earthly affection, to repose in the bosom of the Divinity? Holy desires are the blessed wings with which the Saints burst every worldly tie and fly to the mountain of perfection, where they find that peace which the world cannot give. But how do fervent desires make the soul fly to God? "They," says St. Lanrence Justinian, "supply strength, and render pains light and tolerable." On the one hand, good desires give strength and courage, and on the other, they diminish the labour and fatigue of ascending the mountain of God. Whoever, through diffidence of attaining sanctity, does not ardently desire to become a Saint, will never arrive at perfection. A man who is desirous of obtaining a valuable treasure, which he knows is to be found at the top of a lofty mountain, but who, through fear of fatigue and difficulty, has no desire of ascending, will never advance a single step towards the wished-for object, but will remain below in careless indifference and inactivity And he who, because the path of virtue appears to him narrow and rugged, and difficult to be trodden, does not desire to climb up the mountain of the Lord, to gain the treasure of perfection, will always continue in a state of tepidity, and will never make the smallest progress in the way of God.

2. On the contrary, he that does not desire, and strenuously endeavour, always to advance in holiness, will, as we learn from experience and from all the masters of spiritual life, go backwards in the path of virtue, and will be exposed to great danger of eternal misery. "The path of the just," says Solomon, "as a shining light, goeth forwards and increaseth even to perfect day. The way of the wicked is darksome: they know not when they fall"—Prov. iv. 18, 19. As light increases constantly from sunrise to full day, so the path of the saints always advances; but, the way of sinners becomes continually more dark and gloomy, till they know not where they go, and at length walk into a precipice. "Not to advance," says St. Augustine, "is to go back." St. Gregory beautifully explains this maxim of spiritual life, by comparing a Christian who seeks to remain stationary in the path of virtue, to a man situated in a boat on a rapid river, and striving to keep the boat always in the same position. If the boat be not continually propelled against the current, it will be carried away in an opposite direction, and consequently without continual exertion, its station cannot be maintained. Since the fall of Adam, man is naturally inclined to evil from his birth. "For the imagination and thought of man's heart are prone to evil from his youth"—Gen. viii. 21. If he do not push forward, if he do not endeavour by incessant efforts to improve in sanctity, the very current of passion will carry him back. "Since you do not wish to proceed," says St. Bernard, addressing a tepid soul, "you must fail." "By no means," she replies; "I wish to live, and to remain in my present state. I will not consent to be worse and I do not desire to be better. "You then," rejoins the saint, "wish what is impossible"—Epis. 253, ad Gariv. Because, in the way of God, a Christian must either go forward and advance in virtue, or go backwards and rush headlong into vice.

3. In seeking eternal salvation, we must, according to St. Paul, never rest, but must run continually in the way of perfection, that we may win the prize and secure an incorruptible crown. "So run that you may obtain"—1 Cor. ix. 24. If we fail, the fault will be ours; for God wills that all be holy and perfect. "This is the will of God—your sanctification"—1 Thes. iv. 3, He even commands us to be perfect and holy. "Be you therefore perfect, as also your Heavenly Father is perfect"—Matt. v. 48. "Be holy because I am holy"—Lev. xi. 44. He promises and gives, as the holy Council of Trent teaches, abundant strength for the observance of all his commands, to those who ask it from him. "God does not command impossibilities, but by his precepts he admonishes you to do what you can, and to ask what you cannot do; and he assists you that you may be able to do it"—Sess. vi. c. 13. God does not command impossibilities; but, by his precepts, he admonishes us to do what we can by the aid of his ordinary grace; and when greater helps are necessary, he exhorts us to seek them by humble prayer. He will infallibly attend to our petitions, and enable us to observe all, even the most difficult of his commandments. Take couage, then, and adopt the advice of the venerable Father Torres to a religious who was one of his penitents: "Let us, my child, put on the wings of strong desires, that, quitting the earth, we may fly to our spouse and our beloved, who expects us in the blessed kingdom of eternity."

4. St. Augustine teaches that the life of a good Christian is one continued longing after perfection. "The whole life," says the Saint, "of a good Christian is a holy desire" Tract. 4, in 1 Ep. Joan. He that cherishes not in his heart the desire of sanctity may be a Christian, but he will not be a good one. If this be true of all the servants of God, how much more so must it be of religious, who, though it is not imperative on them to be actually perfect, are strictly obliged to aspire after perfection. "He that enters the religious state," says St. Thomas, "is not commanded to have perfect charity; but he is bound to tend to it. It is not," continues the Saint, "obligatory on him to adopt all the means by which perfection may be attained; but it is his duty to perform the exercises prescribed by the rule, which at his profession he promised to observe"—2, 2, qu. 186, art. 2. Hence, a religious is bound not only to fulfil her vows, but also to assist at public prayer; to make the communions, and to practise the mortifications, ordained by the rule; to observe the silence, and to discharge all the other duties of the community.

5. You will, perhaps, say that your rule does not bind under pain of sin. That may be: but theologians generally maintain that to transgress without a sufficient cause, even the rules which, of themselves, do not impose a moral obligation, is almost always a venial fault. Because the wilful and unnecessary violation of rule generally proceeds from passion, or from sloth, and consequently must be, at least, a venial offence. Hence, St. Francis de Sales, in his entertainments, teaches that, though the rule of the visitation did not oblige under the penalty of sin, still the infraction of it could not be excused from the guilt of a venial transgression. "Because," says the saint, "by disobedience to her rule, a religious dishonours the things of God, violates her profession, disturbes the community, and dissipates the fruits of the good example which every one should give." Whoever, then, breaks the rule in the presence of others, will, according to the saint, incur the additional guilt of scandal. It should be observed, that the breach of rule may be even a mortal sin, when it is so frequent as to do serious injury to regular observance in the community. To violate the rule through contempt, is likewise a grevious transgression. And St. Thomas remarks, "that the frequent infraction of rule practically disposes to the contempt of it"—Cit. qu, 186, art. 6. This is my answer to those tepid religious, who excuse their own irregularities by saying, that the rule imposes no obligation. The fervent spouses of Jesus Christ do not inquire whether their rule has the force of precept or not ; it is enough for them to know that it is approved by God, and that he takes complacency in its observance.

6. As it is impossible to arrive at perfection in any art or science, without ardent desires of its attainment, so no one has ever yet become a saint but by strong and fervent aspirations after sanctity. "God," observes St. Teresa, "ordinarily confers his signal favours on those only who thirst after his love." "Blessed," says the Royal Prophet, "is the man whose help is from thee : in his heart he hath disposed to ascend by steps in the vale of tears. * * * "They shall go from virtue to virtue"—Ps. lxxxiii. 6. Happy the man who has resolved, in his soul, to mount the ladder of perfection : he shall receive abundant aid from God, and will ascend from virtue to virtue. Such has been the practice of the saints, and especially of St. Andrew Avellino, who even bound himself by vow, to advance continually in the way of Christian perfection."—Lect. 5. offic. in die Festi. St. Teresa used to say, that "God rewards, even in this life, every good desire." It was by good desires that the saints arrived, in a short time, at a sublime degree of sanctity. "Being made perfect in a short space, he fulfilled a long time"—Wis. iv. 14. It was thus that Lewis Gonzaga, who lived but twenty-five years, acquired such perfection, that St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, who saw him in bliss, declared that his glory appeared equal to that of most of the saints. In the vision, he said to her, "My eminent sanctity was the fruit of an ardeut desire, which I cherished during my life, of loving God as much as he deserved to be loved : and being unable to love him with that infinite love which he merits, I suffered on earth a continual martyrdom of love, for which I am now raised to that transcendent glory which I enjoy."

7. The works of St. Teresa contain, besides those that have been already adduced, many beautiful passages on this subject. "Our thoughts," says the saint, "should be aspiring : from great desires all our good shall come." In another place, she says : "We must not lower our desires, but should trust in God, that by continual exertion we shall, by his grace, arrive at the sanctity and felicity of the saints." Again she says : "The Divine Majesty takes complacency in generous souls who are diffident in themselves." This great saint asserted that, in all her experience she never knew a timid Christian to attain as much virtue in many years, as certain courageous souls acquire in a few days. The reading of the lives of the saints contributes greatly to infuse courage into the soul. It will be particularly useful to read the lives of those who, after being great sinners, became eminent saints; such as the lives of St. Mary Magdalene, St. Augustine, St. Pelagia, St. Mary of Egypt, and especially of St. Margaret of Cortona, who was for many years in a state of damnation, but, even then, cherished a desire of sanctity, and who, after her conversion, flew to prefection which such rapidity, that she merited to learn by revelation, even in this life, not only that she was predestined to glory, but also that a place was prepared for her among the seraphim. St. Teresa says, that "the devil seeks to persuade us that it would be pride in us to desire a high degree of perfection, or to wish to imitate the saints." She adds, that "it is great delusion to regard strong desires of sanctity as the offspring of pride; for it is not pride in a soul, diffident of herself and trusting only in the power of God, to resolve to walk courageously in the way of perfection, saying with the Apostle, 'I can do all things in him who strengtheneth me'—Phil. iv. 13. Of myself I can do nothing ; but by his aid I shall be able to do all things, and therefore I resolve, with his grace, to desire to love him as the saints have loved him."

8. It is very profitable frequently to aspire after and desire the most exalted virtue ; such as to love God more than all the saints, to suffer for the love of him more than all the martyrs, to bear and to pardon all injuries, to embarce every sort of fatigue and suffering for the sake of saving a single soul, and to perform similar acts of perfect charity. Because these holy aspirations and desires, though their objects shall never be attained, are, in the first place, very meritorious in the sight of God, who glories in men of good will, as he abominates a preverse heart and evil inclinations. Secondly, because the habit of aspiring to heroic sanctity animates and encourages the soul to perform acts of ordinary and easy virtue. Hence, it is of great importance to propose in the morning to labour as much as possible for God during the day, to resolve to bear patiently all crosses and contradictions, to observe constant recollection, and to make continual acts of the love of God. Such was the practise of the seraphic St. Francis. "He proposed," says St. Bonaventure, "with the grace of Jesus Christ, to do great things." St. Teresa asserts that "the Lord is as well pleased with good desires as with their fulfilment." Oh, how much better is it to serve God than to serve the world. To acquire goods of the earth, to procure wealth, honours, and applause of men, it is not enough to pant after them with ardour: no, to desire and not to obtain them only renders their absence more painful. But to merit the riches and favour of God, it is sufficient to desire his grace and love. St. Augustine relates that in a convent of hermits there were two officers of the emperor's court, one of whom began to read the life of St. Anthony. "He read," says the holy doctor, "and his heart was stripped of the world." Turning to his companion, he said: "What do we seek? Can we expect from the emperor anything better than his friendship? Through how many dangers are we to reach still greater perils? and how long shall this last? Fools that we have been, shall we still continue to serve the emperor in the midst of so many labours, fears, and troubles? We can hope for nothing better than his favour; and should we obtain it, we would only increase the danger of our eternal reprobation. It is only with difficulty that we shall ever procure the patronage of Cæsar; but, if I will it, behold, I am in a moment the friend of God." Because whoever wishes, with a true and resolute desire, for the friendship of God, instantly obtains it.

9. I say with a "true and resolute desire;" for little profit is derived from the fruitless desires of slothful souls, who always desire to be saints, but never advance a single step in the way of God. Of them Solomon says: "The sluggard willeth and willeth not"—Prov. xiii. 4. And again: "Desires kill the slothful"—Prov. xxi. 25. The tepid religious desires perfection, but never resolves to adopt the means of its acquirement. Contemplating its advantages she desires it; but, reflecting on the fatigue necessary for its attainment, she desires it not. Thus "she willeth and willeth not." Her desires of sanctity are not efficacious: they have for their object means of salvation incompatible with her state. Oh! she exclaims, were I in the desert, all my time should be employed in prayer and in works of penance! Were I in another convent, I would shut myself up in a cell to think only of God! If my health were good, I would practice continual mortifications. I would wish, I would wish, she cries, to do all this; and still the miserable soul does not fulfil the obligations of her state. She makes but little mental prayer, and is even absent from the common meditations; she neglects communion; is seldom in the choir, and frequently at the grate or on the terrace; she practices but little patience or resignation in her infirmities; in a word, she daily commits wilful and deliberate faults, but never labours to correct them. What, then, will it profit her to desire what is inconsistent with the duties of her present state, while she violates strict obligations? "Desires kill the slothful." Such useless desires expose the soul to great danger of everlasting perdition; because wasting her time, and taking complacency in them, she will neglect the means necessary for the perfection of her state, and for the attainment of eternal life. "I do not," says St. Francis of Sales, "approve of the conduct of those who, while bound by an obligation, or placed in any state, spend their time in wishing for another manner of life, inconsistent with their duties; or for exercises incompatible with their present state. For these desires dissipate the heart, and make it languish in the necessary exercises." It is, then, the duty of a religious to aspire only after that perfection which is sutiable to her present state and to her actual obligations, and whether a superior or a subject, whether in sickness or in health, the vigour of youth or the imbecility of old age, to adopt resolutely the means of sanctity suitable to her condition in life. "The devil," says St. Teresa, "sometimes persuades us that we have acquired the virtue, for example, of patience, because we determine to suffer a great deal for God. We feel really convinced that we are ready to accept any cross, however great, for his sake; and this conviction makes us quite content, for the devil assists us to believe that we are willing to bear all things for God. I advise you not to trust much to such virtue, nor to think that you even know it, except in name, until you see it tried. It will probably happen that, on the first occasion of contradiction, all this patience will fall to the ground."

10. Let us now come to what is most important—the means to be adopted for acquiring sanctity. The first means of perfection is mental prayer, and particularly the meditation of the claims which God has to our love, and of the love which he has borne us, especially in the great work of redemption. To redeem us, a God has even sacrificed his life in a sea of sorrows and contempt, and to obtain our love he has gone so far as to make himself our food. To inflame the soul with the fire of divine love these truths must be frequently meditated. "In my meditation," says David, "a fire shall flame out"—Ps. xxxviii. 4. When I contemplate the goodness of my God, the flames of charity fill my whole heart. St. Lewis Gonzaga used to say that to attain eminent sanctity, it is first necessary to arrive at a high degree of mental prayer. The second means of perfection is to renew frequently our resolution of advancing in divine love. In this renewal you will be greatly assisted by considering each day that it is only then you begin to walk in the path of virtue. This was the practice of holy David. "And I said, now have I begun" —Ps. lxxvi. 11. And this was the dying advice of St. Anthony to his monks: "My dear children, figure to yourselves that each day is the day on which you begin to serve God." The third means is, to search out continually and scrupulously the defects of the soul. "Brethren," says St. Augustine, "examine yourselves with rigour; be always displeased with what you are if you desire to become what you are not"—De Verb. Apos. Serm. 15. To arrive at that perfection which you have not attained, you must never be satisfied with the virtue you possess; "for," continues the saint, "where you have been pleased with yourself there you have remained." Whenever you are content with the degree of sanctity which you have acquired, there you will rest, and, taking complacency in yourself, you will lose the desire of further perfection. Hence, the holy doctor adds what should terrify every tepid soul, who, content with her present virtue, has but little desire of spiritual advancement. "But if you have said it is sufficient, you have perished. If you have said that you have already attained sufficient perfection, you are lost; for not to advance in the way of God is to retrograde." And, as St. Bernard says, "not to wish to go forward is certainly to fail"—Ep. 253, Gariv. Hence, St. Chrysostom exhorts us to think continually on the virtues we do not possess, and never to reflect on the little good which we have done; for the thought of our good works "generates indolence and inspires arrogance" (Hom. 12, in Ep. ad Phil.) and serves only to engender sloth in the way of the Lord, and to swell the heart with vain glory, which exposes the soul to the danger of losing the virtues she has acquired. "He that runs," continues the saint, "does not compute the progress he has made, but the distance he has to travel." He that aspires after perfection does not stop to calculate the proficiency he has made, but directs all his attention to the virtue he has still to acquire. Fervent Christians, as they that dig a treasure, (Job. iii. 21,) advance in virtue as they approach the end of life. As St. Gregory says, in his comment on this passage of Job, that the man who seeks a treasure the deeper he has dug the more he exerts himself in the hope of finding it; so the soul that pants after holiness multiplies her efforts to attain it in proportion to the advancement she has made.

11. The fourth means is that which St. Bernard employed to excite his fervour. "He had," says Surius, "this always in his heart, and frequently in his mouth: Bernard for what purpose hast thou come?" Every religious should continually ask herself the same question. I have left the world and all its riches and pleasures, to live in the cloister and to become a saint; what progress do I make? I do not advance in sanctity; no, but by my tepidity I expose myself to the danger of eternal perdition." It will be useful, to introduce, in this place, the example of the venerable Sister Hyacinth Marescotti, who at first led a very tepid life in the convent of St. Bernardine, in Viterbo. She confessed to Father Bianchetti, a Franciscan, who came to the convent as extraordinary confessor. That holy man thus addressed her: "Are you a nun? Are you not aware that paradise is not prepared for vain and proud religious?" "Then," she replied, "have I left the world to cast myself into hell?" "Yes," rejoined the father, "that is the place which is destined for religious who live like seculars." Reflecting on these words of the holy man, Sister Hyacinth was struck with remorse, and, bewailing her past life, she made her confession with tearful eyes, and began from that moment to walk resolutely in the way of perfection. Oh! how salutary is the thought of having abandoned the world to become a saint! It awakens the tepidity of the religious, and encourages her to advance continually in holiness, and to surmount every obstacle to her ascent up to the mountain of God. Whenever, then, O spouse of Jesus, you meet with difficulties in the practice of obedience, say to your heart: I have not entered religion to do my own will; if I wished to follow my own inclinations, I should have remained in the world; but I have come here to do the will of God, by obedience to my superiors, and this I desire to do in spite of all difficulties. Whenever you experience the inconveniences of poverty, say: I have not left the world and retired into the cloiter for the enjoyment of ease and riches, but to practice poverty for the love of my Jesus, who, for my sake, became poorer than I am. When you are rebuked or treated with contempt, say: I have become a religious only to receive, and bear with patience, the humiliations due to my sins, and thus render myself dear to my divine spouse, who was so much despised on earth. By this means you will live to God, and die to the world. In conclusion, I recommend you frequently to ask yourself this question: What will it profit me having abandoned the world, to have confined myself in the cloister, and to have given up my liberty, if I do not become a saint, but if, on the contrary, I expose my soul to everlasting misery by a careless, and tepid, and negligent life?

12. The fifth means for a religious to attain sanctity is frequently to call to mind, and to renew the sentiments of fervour, and the desires of perfection, which she felt when she first entered religion. The Abbot Agatho being once asked by a monk for a rule of conduct in religion, replied: "See what you were on the day you left the world, and persevere in the dispositions you then entertained." Remember, O consecrated virgin, the resolutions which you made on the day you retired from the world, to seek nothing but God, to have no will but his, and to suffer all manner of contempt and hardship for the love of Jesus Christ. This thought, as we learn from the Lives of the Fathers (part ii. sec. 231,) brought back to his first fervour a young monk who had fallen into tepidity. When he first determined to retire into a monastery, his mother strongly opposed his design, and endeavoured, by various reasons, to show that it was his bounden duty not to abandon her. To all her arguments he replied: "I am resolved to save my soul." And, in spite of her opposition, he entered religion; but after some time his ardour cooled, and tepidity stole into his heart. His mother died, and a little after her death he was seized with a dangerous malady. In his sickness he thought he saw himself before the judgment-seat of God, and his mother reproaching him with the violation of his first resolution. "My son," said she, "you have forgotten the words, 'I am resolved to save my soul,' by which you replied to all my entreaties. You have become a religious, and is it thus you live?" He recovered from his infirmity, and, reflecting on his first fervour, he commenced a life of holiness, and began to practice such mortifications that his companions advised him to moderate such austerities. To their admonitions he answered: "If I have not been able to bear the rebuke of my mother, how shall I, if

I abuse his graces, support the reproaches of Jesus Christ in judgment?" The reading of the lives of the saints is very profitable to us; their examples humble us, and make us know and feel our own miseries. The poor understand their poverty only when they see the treasures of the rich.

13. The sixth means is not to lose courage, when you perceive that you have not as yet arrived at the perfection to which you aspire. To be discouraged by the imperfections which you desire to correct would be to yield to a great delusion of the devil. St. Philip Neri used to say, that "to become a saint is not the work of a day." It is related, in the Lives of the Fathers, that a certain monk, after having commenced his religious career with great fervour, relaxed his zeal, and remained for some time in a state of tepidity; but, reflecting on his unhappy condition, he began to sigh after his former piety, and became greatly afflicted because he knew not how to recover it. In this disposition of mind he sought advice from an aged father. The good father consoled and encouraged him, by relating the conduct of a parent, who commanded his son to clear a certain portion of land from thorns and briars. Disheartened by the difficulty of the task, and despairing of success, the son neglected altogether the duty imposed upon him, and excused himself to his father, saying that he had not courage to undertake such labour. In answer, the father said to him: "My son, I only ask you to cleanse, every day, as much land as will contain a human body." The son began to work, and by degrees he removed every useless and noxious plant. This example is well adapted to encourage and stimulate us in our progress to perfection. He that always cherishes an ardent desire of advancement, and strives continually to go forward, will, with the divine assistance, obtain the perfection after which he aspires. St. Bernard says, that to make constant exertions to advance in virtue is the perfection that can be attained in this life. "Continued efforts for perfection," says the saint, "are reputed perfection"—Ep. 253, ad Garivum. You must be careful never to omit your usual exercises, your meditations, communions, or mortifications. This rule must be particularly observed in the time of aridity. It is then that God tries his faithful servants, and that they prove their fidelity to him, by discharging, in spite of their darkness, pains, and difficulties, the duties which, amid the abundance of his celestial consolations, they were accustomed to perform.

14. The last and most efficacious means of perfection is to have continually before your eyes the examples of the sisters who are most distinguished for sanctity, in order to imitate the virtues which they practice. St. Anthony says, "as the bee gathers honey from every flower, so a religious should draw lessons of perfection from the good example of all her companions. She should emulate the modesty of one, the charity and affection for prayer of another, the frequent communion of a third, and all the other virtues practiced by the rest of the community. Such is the holy zeal with which a good religious should endeavour to rival, and even to excel, all the sisters in all virtues. Worldlings seek to surpass each other in riches, honours, and earthly pleasures, but a religious ought to struggle for the superiority in humility, patience, meekness, charity, love of contempt, poverty, purity, and obedience. To outstrip each other in loving and pleasing God, should be the object of their emulation. To succeed in this holy contest, a religious must perform all her ordinary duties with the intention of pleasing God and of edifying her companions, that thus she may sanctify herself and give greater glory to the Lord. "So let your light shine before men that they may see your works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven"—Matt. v. 46. Hence, they who admit to the religious profession a novice whose conduct disedifies her sisters, incur a great responsibility; for as good example stimulates to virtue, so the loose and irregular lives of the tepid scandalize the community, and lead many of its members into the faults which they witness every day.

PRAYER.

O divine heart of my Jesus! Heart enamoured of men! Heart created to love them! how is it possible that thou hast been so much dishonoured and despised by them? Unhappy me! I, too, have been one of those ungrateful souls; I, too, have lived so many years in the world, and have not loved thee. Pardon me, O my Jesus, the great fault of not having loved thee, who art so amiable, and who hast loved me so much that thou couldst not have done more than thou hast done to oblige me to love thee. In punishment of having so long despised thy love I would deserve to be condemned to that miserable state in which I could never love thee. But now, my spouse, I cheerfully accept every chastisement, except the eternal privation of thy love. Grant me the grace to love thee, and then dispose of me as thou pleasest. But how can I fear such a chastisement, when thou dost continue still to command me to love thee, my Lord and my God. "Thou shalt," you say, "love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart."

It is thy will that I love thee with my whole soul, and I desire nothing but to love thee with all my strength. O loving heart of my Jesus, light up in my soul that blessed fire which thou camest on earth to enkindle. Destroy all the earthly attachments which still live in my heart, and prevent me from belonging entirely to thee. O my beloved Saviour, do not reject the love of a heart which has hitherto so much afflicted thee. Ah! since thou hast loved me so much, do not permit me to live for a single moment without thy love. O love of my Jesus, thou art my love. I hope that I shall always love thee, and that thou wilt always love me; and that this mutual love will never be dissolved. O Mary, mother of fair love, O thou who dost desire to see your Son loved, bind and unite me to Jesus, so that I may become entirely his, as he desires me to be. Amen.

CHAPTER V.

On the danger to which an imperfect Religious, who is but little afraid of her imperfection, exposes her salvation.

The first step to be taken in the formation of a garden is to root out all useless and noxious weeds, and to put in their place fruitful and salutary plants. It was in this way the Almighty commanded Jeremiah to proceed when he imposed upon him the arduous task of cultivating the Church. "Lo, I have set thee this day over the nations and over kingdoms to root up, and to pull down, and to waste, and to destroy, to build, and to plant"—Jer. i. 10. To become a saint, then, a religious must, in the first place, endeavour to eradicate from her soul all imperfections, and to plant in their stead the virtues of the Gospel. "The first devotion," says St. Teresa, "is to take away all sins." I do not speak of grevious sins, from which I suppose the religious who reads this book to be exempt. I hope she has never lost the grace of God infused by baptism, or, at least, that she has recovered it, and that she is resolved to suffer a thousand deaths rather than forfeit it again. To prevent the danger of relapse, I entreat her to keep always in mind the alarming doctrine so strongly inculcated in the Holy Scriptures, and taught by St. Basil, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and other fathers, that God has fixed for each person the number of sins which he will pardon. Being ignorant of this number, we should tremble, lest, adding another to our past sins, we complete the measure of our iniquities, be abandoned by God, and lost for ever. This thought has powerful efficacy in dispelling the illusion by which the devil so often induces Christians to relapse into sin. Holding out the hope of pardon to them, he says: "You may indulge your passion for this time; you will afterwards confess it, and obtain forgiveness." Oh! if Christians were penetrated with the salutary fear that any new sin should never be forgiven, would they not be struck with horror at the very idea of relapse? But, through a false hope of pardon, innumerable souls return to there former crimes, until the measure of their iniquities is filled up, and are thus irremediably lost.

2. Neither do I speak of venial faults of imperfect advertence, or of human frailty, when I say that a religious should cleanse her soul from all sins. From such imperfections no one is exempt: "For," says St. James, "in many things we all offend"—James, iii. 2. Even the saints have fallen into the sins of frailty. "If," says St. John, "we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us"—1 John, i 8. Our corrupt nature is so strongly inclined to evil that it is impossible for us, without a most special grace (which has been given only to the Mother of God) to avoid during our whole lives all venial sins—even those that are but imperfectly deliberate. God permits such defects even in souls dedicated to his love, to keep them humble, and to make them feel that, as they fall into light transgressions in spite of all their resolutions and promises, so, but for his divine support, they should likewise be precipitated into grevious crimes. When we are guilty of a venial fault, we must humble our souls, and, confessing our weakness, must endeavour to multiply prayer, and to implore the aid of the protecting arm of God against more grevious offences.

3. Here, then, I mean to speak only of deliberate and fully voluntary venial sins. All these may be avoided, and are seldom or never committed by holy souls, who live with the firm and constant resolution rather to suffer death than, with full advertence, to be guilty of a venial violation of God's holy law. St. Catherine of Genoa used to say that "to a soul inflamed with the pure love of God the smallest fault is more intolerable than hell itself." Hence, she frequently protested that, "rather than wilfully commit a venial sin, she would suffer to be cast into an ocean of fire." It is no wonder that the saints had such a horror of the smallest sin; for, illuminated by the light of God, they saw and felt that the least offence against his infinite majesty is a much greater evil than the death and destruction of all men and angels. "What sin," says St. Anslem, "will the sinner dare to call small? For when can it be a slight fault to dishonour God ?" Who shall ever be daring enough to assert that such a sin, because it is venial, is not a great evil ! Can it ever be said that an indignity to the Lord is but of little moment ? If a subject said to his sovereign : In other things I will obey you, but not in this, because it is unimportant—what censure and chastisement would he not deserve ? Hence, St. Teresa used to say : "Would to God we had a horror, not of the devils, but of every venial sin, from which we may suffer far greater injury than from all the devils in hell." She would frequently say to her spiritual children : "From all deliberate sins, however small, may God deliver you." Religious should take particular care to avoid the least offence of God. Of them, St. Gregory Nazianzen says : "Do you know that in you a wrinkle is a greater deformity than the greatest wounds are in seculars" —Orat. de Fuco. If a servant, whose occupation renders cleanliness impossible, appear in soiled clothes before the king, he treats her with compassion rather than with severity. But if he sees a stain on the garments of his spouse, the queen, he is indignant, and bursts out into expressions of complaint and reproach. Jesus Christ is likewise indulgent to the sins of seculars, but bitterly complains of the faults of his spouses. Unhappy the religious who is regardless of light defects ! She shall never become a saint, and shall never enjoy peace. St. Teresa, while she led an imperfect life, made no progress in virtue, and enjoying neither spiritual consolation nor sensual pleasure, lived in a state of continual misery. It is because they are heedless of their imperfections that so many nuns are always unhappy. They are, on the one hand, far removed from the pleasures of the world, and, on the other, never experience the joy and tranquillity of a good conscience. For, since they are not generous to God, he is justly sparing in his favours to them. Let us offer our whole being to God, and he will give himself entirely to us. "I to my beloved, and his turning is towards me"—Cant. vii. 10.

4. But you will say, venial sins, however great, though they may prevent me being a Saint, will not deprive me of the grace of God, and for me, it is enough to obtain salvation. Whoever speaks thus should reflect on the words of St. Augustine : "Where you have said it is sufficient, you have perished." Do you then say that for you it is sufficient ? If you do, you are lost. To understand this truth, and to see the danger of venial sins, particularly when they are deliberate and habitual, it is necessary to consider that the habit of light faults inclines the soul to grievous transgressions. Thus the habit of slight aversions disposes the will to mortal hatred, the habit of small thefts to gross rapine, and the habit of sensual attachments to impure affections. St. Gregory (Mor. lib. 21) says, "the soul never remains where it falls;" no, she always sinks still lower. As mortal diseases often proceed from slight indisposition, so grievous transgressions often have their origin in habitual venial sins. "Trivial detractions," says Father Alvarez, "slight aversions, culpable curiosity, acts of impatience and intemperance, do not kill the soul: but they render her so weak that, when assailed by any grievous temptation, she has not strength to resist it, and falls." Venial sins do not indeed separate the soul from God, but they estrange her affections from him, and thus expose her to great danger of losing his grace. When Jesus was taken in the garden, St. Peter did not wish to abandon his Master, but "followed him afar off"—St. Matt. xxvi. 58. Many, though unwilling to be separated from Jesus Christ by mortal sins, will follow him only at a distance, and will make no effort to abstain from venial faults. But how many such Christians have imitated the conduct of St. Peter, who three times denied that he was a disciple of the Redeemer, and to his denial added the guilt of perjury. St. Isidore says, "that in punishment of their indifference, and the tepidity of their love to him, God justly permits those who disregard venial faults to fall into mortal sins." "He that contemneth small things, shall fall by little and little"—Eccl. xix. 1.

5. "Do not then, therefore," says St. Dorotheus, say that "the habit of venial sins is only a small evil, but reflect on its consequences. A bad habit is an ulcer which infects the soul; and as it diminishes her strength to avoid light faults, so it gradually renders her unable to resist grievous temptations. "Do not," says St. Augustine, "contemn them because they are numerous: ruin is to be apprehended from their multitude, though not from their magnitude." Despise not your faults because they are venial, but tremble because they are many: for the greatness of their number may bring upon you that destruction which the heinousness of their malice does not deserve. "You," says the Saint, in another place, "carefully fly from the danger of being crushed by a rock: but I cautiou you to shun the risk of suffocation by a heap of sand." By a collection of sand, the holy father means frequent habitual venial transgressions, which when committed with deliberation and without efforts of amendment, destroy in the soul the fear of committing mortal sins. And whoever fears them but little will easily fall into them. Hence, St. John Chrysostom has gone so far as to assert that we should, in a certain manner, have a greater dread of habitual venial sins than of mortal sin, because the latter naturally excites horror; but as the habit of the former generates negligence and contempt for small faults, so likewise it induces a disregard for grievous transgressions. Hence, the Holy Ghost says: "Catch us the little foxes that destroy the vines"—Cant. ii. 15. He does not tell us to catch the lions or the leopards, but the little foxes. We tremble at the approach of the lion, or of other fierce animals, and therefore we take care to guard against their attacks; but we fear not little foxes, and therefore, through our negligence, they, by their excavations, dry up the root and destroy the vine. In like manner, frequent and voluntary faults, though small, dry up the good desires of the soul, which are the roots of spiritual life, and thus produce decay and ruin.

6. Habitual and voluntary venial sins expose the soul to the danger of perdition: first, because, as we have already seen, they incline the will to mortal sin, and diminish its strength to resist temptations. Secondly, because they deprive her of numberless helps from God, which he had prepared for her. To incline the will to good, the understanding must be continually illuminated by the light of God; and to become pliant and obedient to the motions of grace, the will requires the constant assistance of God. Besides, to resist the powers of hell we stand in need of the continual protection of the Lord. Without it we should all yield to the temptations of the devil, which, of ourselves, we are utterly unable to overcome. It is God that either enables us to conquer all the powers of darkness, or prevents the devil from suggesting temptations to which we would yield. Hence, Jesus Christ has taught us the prayer "and lead us not into temptation;" that is, preserve us from those temptations to which we would consent. Now, what are the effects of venial sins? They diminish the lights, the helps, and the protection of God; so that the soul, being darkened, weak, and dry, will lose all affection for the things of God, will become attached to the things of the world, and thus exposed to great danger of renouncing the grace of God for the sake of earthly goods. Besides, in punishment of venial sins, Almighty God permits the soul to be assailed with more violent temptations. Whosoever is ungenerous to God does not deserve liberality from him. "He who soweth sparingly shall also reap sparingly"—2 Cor. ix. 6. Blessed Henry Suson, in the vision of the rocks, described in his life (Vita, cap. 12,) seeing a great many on the first rock, asked who they were? Jesus Christ answered: "These are the tepid, who only seek to avoid mortal sin." The holy man then asked if they would be saved? "If," replied the Redeemer, "they die in the state of grace they will be saved, but their danger is much greater than they imagine. They think they can serve God and the senses; but this is scarcely possible, for it is exceedingly difficult to persevere in the grace of God, and at the same time to indulge in sensual pleasures."

7. "Be not without fear about sins forgiven"—Eccl. v. 5. Why does the Holy Ghost admonish us to be afraid of sin which has been already pardoned? Because after the guilt is remitted the temporal penalties of sin still remain, and among them we must reckon the withdrawal of God's graces. Hence, the saints never cease to weep for their faults, though only venial, and even after they had been forgiven, for they always trembled lest their past transgressions should be punished by the subtraction of the graces necessary to obtain eternal life. A favourite who has offended his sovereign will not be raised to his former rank and dignity immediately after he has obtained pardon, nor until he has given strong proofs of a determination to atone, by future services, for his past misconduct. And when Christians insult the majesty of their God, he justly withdraws his protecting arm, and his former familiarity, until, by tears of sorrow and other good works, they have expiated their guilt. The more frequently the soul displeases God, the more will he retire from her. By repeated faults her weakness and her inclination to evil are increased, while the graces of God are diminished, and then she will easily fall into eternal ruin.

8. Every Christian who, because he desires to do only what is necessary for salvation, commits habitually deliberate venial sins, is, as we have seen, exposed to the danger of being lost. How much more perilous must be the state of a religious who, with full knowledge, and without any thought or effort of amendment, commits light faults, saying, "for me it is sufficient to be saved." The spouse of Jesus being called to religion, is called not only to be saved, but also to be a saint. Now, St. Gregory says, "that he who is called to sublime sanctity, will not be saved without it." Jesus Christ said, one day, to blessed Angela of Foligno: "They who, after being enlightened by me to walk in the way of perfection, will only tread in the ordinary path, shall be abandoned by me." It is certain that every religious is called and commanded to walk in the way of perfection. It is to enable her to become a saint that God has bestowed upon her so many special lights and graces. Now, if she lead a life of habitual negligence and continual defects, without ever seeking to correct them, she will justly forfeit all claim to the helps necessary for the fulfilment of her obligations, and thus she will neither become a saint nor be saved. St. Augustine says, "that God ordinarily abandons tepid souls, who, reckless of the consequences, wilfully neglect their duties, and disregard their defects." "God is accustomed to desert the negligent."

9. "If," says Jesus to St. Peter, "I wash thee not, thou shalt have no part with me"—John, xiii. 8. Jesus Christ spoke in this place, not of the physical washing of the feet, but of the spiritual cleansing of the soul from venial sins, which, unless corrected and expiated, will make those who are called to perfection liable to great danger of perdition. St. Gertrude saw the devil gathering all the little tufts of wool which she allowed to be destroyed; as if her negligence in not preserving them were a fault against holy poverty. To another religious, who, contrary to rule, permitted the fragments of bread which remained after meals to fall off the table, he showed at the hour of death a large mass of these fragments which he had collected, and by this representation endeavoured to lead the religious into despair. The enemy of our souls is well aware that God will demand a much stricter account from religious than from seculars. And here it may be remarked that, according to the common opinion of theologians, many violations of rule, which in subjects are but light faults, will be grievous sins in the superior, if, when they are frequent and calculated to produce general relaxation of discipline, she do not correct them according to the best of her ability, and insist on the reparation necessary to preserve exact observance. To this class belong faults regarding silence, poverty, fasts, the grate, and all similar transgressions. And superiors are strictly obliged not only to correct such defects, but also to examine carefully whether they have been committed.

10. Let us now return to the obligation of a religious to aim at perfection, and to avoid even venial sins. In the time of St. Ignatius there was one of the lay brothers very negligent in the service of God. One day the saint said to him: "Tell me, brother, for what purpose have you entered religion?" "I have come," replied the brother, "to serve God." "O brother," rejoined the saint, "what have you said? If you answered that you had come to attend a cardinal or an earthly prince, your conduct would be more excusable: but you say you have come to serve the Lord, and is it thus you serve him?" To become a saint, the religious stands in need of particular and abundant graces. Now, how can God be expected to bestow his favours in abundance on the religious who, after having retired into the cloister to serve the Lord, dishonours rather than glorifies his name? For, by her negligence and continual defects, she insinuates that God does not merit to be served with greater fervour. By her imperfect life she declares that his service does not content the soul, or impart that felicity which is represented in the Holy Scriptures as the portion of God's servants on earth; in a word, she proclaims that his divine Majesty does not deserve to be loved in preference to the indulgence of all caprice or sensuality.

11. "It is true," says Father Alvarez, "that even souls devoted to the love of God are not free from all imperfections. But they seek continually to amend their lives by diminishing the number of their defects." But how will the tepid religious, who commits habitual faults, and continues to commit them without remorse or desire of amendment—how, I say, will she be ever able to purify her soul from them, or to escape the danger of falling into mortal sin? The venerable Lewis du Pont used to say: I have been guilty of many faults, but never without scruple and uneasiness of conscience. Woe to the religious who sins, even venially, with full knowledge and tranquility of soul. As long, says St. Bernard, as the soul detests her imperfections we may hope for amendment, but when she commits faults without fear or remorse, then she will always go from bad to worse. "Dying flies," says the wise man, "spoil the sweetness of the ointment"—Eccl. x. 1. "These dying flies," says the Carthusian, "are the defects which remain in the soul, and are not detested; such as habitual feeling of dislike, inordinate affections, vanity, indulgence of the appetite, want of modesty in looks and of delicacy in words. These defects spoil the sweetness of the ointment; they diminish devotion at communion, at meditation, and in the visitation of the Blessed Sacrament. Thus the soul loses all the spiritual unction and consolations of religion.

12. These habitual faults, like a foul incrustation, take away the beauty of the soul, render it an object of disgust, and unworthy the embraces of the Holy Ghost. "They are," says St. Augustine, "as it were an irruption, and destroy our comeliness, so as to remove us from the embraces of the spouse"—Hom. 50, cap. 3. Hence, feeling no more consolation in her exercise of devotion, the soul will soon omit and abandon them, and, neglecting the means of salvation, she will probably be lost. If the tepid religious should continue her communions, meditations, and visits to the Blessed Sacrament, she will draw but little fruit from them. In her will be verified the words of the Holy Ghost: —"You have sowed much, and brought in little. * * * And he that hath earned wages put them into a bag with holes"—Agg. i. 6. Such precisely is the tepid and imperfect religious. All her spiritual exercises are laid up in a bag with holes; for them no reward remains. Being performed with so much tepidity, they render her always more and more deserving of chastisement, and deprive her of those abundant helps which God had prepared for her, had she corresponded with his holy inspirations. "For he that hath, to him shall be given, and he shall abound; but he that hath not, from him shall be taken away that also which he hath"—Matt. xiii. 12. Whoever by his co-operation treasures up the fruit of the graces received from God shall obtain an increase of grace and glory; but from the man who buries his talent, thus rendering it unprofitable, that which he hath shall be taken, and the graces prepared for him shall be withheld.

PRAYER.

Behold, O Lord, I am one of those unhappy souls who deserve to be left by thee in the miserable state of tepidity, in which, deprived of thy light and abandoned by thy grace, I lived for so many years. But I now see the light which thou givest me; and I hear thy voice calling me again to thy love. These graces are so many proofs that thou hast not as yet abandoned me. And since thou hast not cast me away in punishment of so much ingratitude, I desire never more to be ungrateful to thee. Thou art ready to pardon me, if I repent of the offences I have committed against thee. Pardon me, O Jesus, for I detest and abhor my sins above all things. Would that I had died before I ever offended thee! Thou dost wish for my love; I desire nothing more but to love thee. I love thee, O my Sovereign Good: I love thee, O my God, who art worthy of infinite love. Increase, O Lord, in my soul thy own light, and the desire thou givest me to belong entirely to thee. Thou art omnipotent: thou canst easily change my heart, and make a rebel to thy graces become an ardent lover of thy goodness. Such I desire and hope to be, with the assistance of thy grace. Thou hast promised to hear all who pray to thee. I now ask thee to make me belong entirely to thee, and love nothing but thee. Ah! Jesus, my spouse, through the merits of thy blood, make me love thee as a sinner ought to love, whom thou hast loved so much, and whose ingratitude thou hast borne with so much patience and for so many years. Trusting, then, in thy infinite mercy, I hope with a firm confidence to love thee with my whole heart in this life, and in the next to praise for all eternity thy mercies to me. "The mercies of the Lord I will sing for ever." O Mary, my mother, I acknowledge that these graces, this light, these desires, and this good will, which God now gives to me, are the fruits of thy intercession. Continue, O Mary, continue to intercede for me, and do not cease to pray for my sanctification until my whole being shall be as thou dost desire, consecrated without reserve to Jesus Christ. Such, O Mary, my firm hope: may it soon be realized. Amen.

CHAPTER VI.

Continuation of the same subject.

The religious whose faults spring from attachment to any passion, is exposed, in a particular manner, to the danger of being lost. O God! how many religious are there who, because they do not disengage their hearts from certain earthly attachments, never become saints, and endanger their eternal salvation. To conquer her passions, to expel from her soul all worldly affections, and to remove every obstacle to her progress in perfection, should be the end and object of a religious, in all her spiritual exercises, in her communions, meditations, spiritual lectures, and in all similar duties. To this end she should direct all her devotions and all her prayers, begging continually of the Almighty a perfect detachment from every creature, and a complete victory over all her corrupt inclinations. To gain this victory, she ought, in the first place, to direct her attention to the practice of exterior mortification, and particularly to the mortification of the eyes, of the appetite, and of the tongue. Secondly, she should endeavour to mortify and to eradicate all the irregular affections of the heart, such as attachment to self-esteem, to the things of the world, or to any other object in which she takes delight. Thirdly, she must strive to destroy self-will, by acting continually in opposition to her own inclinations. Lastly, she should seek to do all this with ease and cheerfulness: for, in this great contest with the corruption of nature, she shall always have some passion to moderate, or some virtue to improve. There are some who continue their communions and meditations, but in them they only seek spiritual refreshment and sensible devotion. Hence, they remain always bound down to the earth by worldly attachments, which continually impede their advancement in holiness, and make them recede more and more every day from their first fervour.

2. It frequently happens that such persons, in the end, lose the grace of God. It is necessary to impress deeply on your mind, that the artifice by which the devil seeks to draw spiritual souls from the service of God is not to tempt them at first to any mortal sin. In the beginning he is, as St. Francis says, satisfied to hold them in bondage by a single hair: for if he attempted to bind them at once in the bonds of servitude, they would fly from him with horror. But, fearing not the trammels of a single hair, they are easily led into the snares prepared for their destruction. At first they are caught by a single hair; then they are bound by a slender thread; next by a strong cord; and, finally, they are chained in the fetters of hell and the slavery of Satan. For example, a religious, after a dispute with some of her sisters, will, at first, retain feelings of dislike, and thus is held by a single hair. After a little time, she will neither speak to them nor salute them: she is now bound by a slender thread. Next, she will begin to injure them by words and deeds, and is fettered by a strong cord: then, on the first occasion of provocation, she conceives a mortal hatred towards them, and thus puts on the chains of hell and the slavery of the devil. Again, another religious will, at first, entertain a human affection towards a friend; she then cherishes this affection under pretext of gratitude: mutual presents follow; they are succeeded by words of endearment; and, by the first assault of passion, the miserable soul is bound in the chains of death. In fine, as gamesters, by the loss of many small sums, are induced to risk and to lose their whole property; so the tepid soul, by frequent venial faults, is rendered reckless of God's grace, and too weak to resist the temptations of the enemy. Thus she loses her God and her all. To find us addicted to any passion is, to the devil, a powerful stimulus to exert himself for our destruction. "It is," says St. Ambrose, "principally when he sees any passions generated in us that the adversary lays his snares: it is then that he excites concupiscence, and prepares his nets." The enemy endeavours to discover the evil inclinations which predominate in our hearts, and presenting to us opportunities of indulging these corrupt tendencies, foments our passions, and prepares a snare for our destruction.

3. "When," says Cassian, "we hear of the fall of a soul consecrated to God, we are not to imagine that she fell at once into mortal sin. No, we must suppose that she began by light faults, and by them was led into grievous transgressions." St. Chrysostom asserts that he knew persons who appeared to be adorned with all virtues, and who, because they disregarded venial sins, were by them precipitated into an abyss of crime. The venerable Sister Anne of the Incarnation saw, in hell, a soul reputed by her and by all to be a saint. On her countenance appeared a multitude of small animals, representing the first faults which she disregarded. Of these animals some were heard to say to the unhappy soul, "With us you commenced;" others, "By us you continued;" and the rest, "By us you were lost." Hence, mother Mary Victoria Strada used to say: "The devil, when he cannot have much is content with a little; and with a little he afterwards acquires a great deal." At first the serpent tempted Eve not to eat, but only to behold the forbidden fruit; he then raised doubts about the fulfilment of the divine threats; and, in the end, induced her to violate God's command. St. Teresa observes that the enemy is satisfied when a soul begins to open to him the gate of her heart, he will afterwards obtain full possession of it. This is also the doctrine of St. Jerome. "The devil," says the holy doctor, "does not contend at once against any one by temptations to great vices, but only to small faults, that he may, by some means, enter the heart of man, and thus aferwards impel him to more heinous crimes"—Ep. xl. He does not immediately tempt any one to mortal sin; but commences by suggesting light defects, that, gaining admission into the soul, and beginning his rule, he may afterwards draw her into grievous transgressions. "No one," says St. Bernard, "is plunged at once into the depths of turpitude: they who fall into the greatest enormities begin by the smallest faults." A spark will set fire to a forest. "Behold," says St. James, "how small a fire—what a great wood it kindleth!"—James, iii. 5. One unmortified passion will ruin the soul.

4. And here it is necessary to remark most particularly, that whenever a religious is guilty of mortal sin, her fall will expose her to great danger of being abandoned by God: for being committed amid the lights and graces of God, imparted to her by means of so many sermons, communions, meditations, good examples of companions, admonitions of spiritual directors and of superiors, her transgression will not be like that of seculars, who sin in the midst of the darkness of the world, but will be a sin of malice. After having received so many lights, and having in her hands so many means of obtaining strength against the enemy of her salvation, she cannot allege ignorance or weakness in extenuation of her guilt. According to the doctrine of St. Thomas, a sin of malice is that which is committed with full knowledge of its enormity. Hence, because the darkness arising from sin is proportional to the lights bestowed on its author, the sin of malice produces great misery in the soul. Besides, the angelic doctor teaches that the grievousness of sin increases in proportion to the ingratitude of the sinner. Now the graces and favours which a religious has received from God are innumerable. He has taken her from the midst of the dangers of the world, and, because every convent is the house of God, has given her a place in his own habitation. From a vast multitude of his servants he has selected her for his spouse; and to make her a saint, and fit to be a spouse of God, he has enriched her with so many lights and external and internal helps to sanctity. He has frequently given himself to her in the holy Eucharist; and in her meditations, visits, and spiritual lectures, has often spoken to her familiarly as a friend. In a word, he has raised her up from the depths of lowliness, and placed her among the princes of his people. And after all these favours she, by sin, turns her back upon him, and deliberately determines to become his enemy. Unhappy soul, her fall will be her destruction. He that falls on level ground seldom sustains serious injury; but he that tumbles from a lofty eminence is said not to fall, but to be dashed to ruin. "A fall from on high," says St. Ambrose, "is accompanied with great destruction." And the prophet Ezechiel says: "And I set thee in the holy mountain of God. * * * And thou hast sinned: and I cast thee out from the mountain of God, and destroyed thee"—Ezec. xxviii. 14, 16. Ungrateful soul, the Almighty will say to the religious, I placed you on my holy mountain, and from its summit you have voluntarily fallen into sin. In punishment then of your ingratitude remain in perdition, for I have banished you for ever from my face. "God," says Sister Mary Strozzi, "wishes religious to be the mirror of the entire world. Hence, because they are called to extraordinary perfection, they dishonour him greatly by an imperfect life. The sin of a religious excites the horror of paradise, and obliges the Almighty to turn away from her: for he repudiates faithless spouses who violate the contract made at their profession, and therefore he abandons them to their irregular passions." O how difficult is the conversion of a soul who, after having once tasted the sweetness of God, becomes a rebel to his love.

5. A religious, then, should tremble at the thought of being bound to the service of Satan by any passion, or by any, even the smallest sin. She should, I say, tremble; because every little attachment may cause her damnation. St. Teresa used to say, that "whoever approaches ruin will be lost." This observation is most just. For although she had never been guilty of a mortal sin, Almighty God showed her the place prepared for her in hell if she had not relinquished an irregular, though not an unchaste, affection which she entertained towards a relative. A bird unshackled flies with ease, but when tied, even by a slender thread, it remains on the earth, and like the toad will continue to crawl in the mire. So a religious, free from all earthly attachments, flies, and will continually fly, to God. But while any affection to creatures dwells in her heart she will never rise above the earth, but will fall continually into greater defects, till at length all is lost. In fine, you must be persuaded that the salvation of a religious depends on the correction of light faults, particularly when frequent and habitual: for so many little streams will form a river in which she will be overwhelmed. Habitual faults, disregarded and not corrected, will, by degrees, draw her into the state of tepidity —that miserable state of which the Redeemer said to the Bishop of Laodicea: "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot"—Apoc. iii. 15. Behold the state of a tepid religious. She is not daring enough to abandon God altogether, but she despises light faults. She commits a great many every day, by impatience, lies, murmuring, greediness, imprecations; by aversions, and by attachments to worldly goods, to the grate, to curiosity, to self-esteem, and to self-will. And these imperfections she neither regrets nor endeavours to correct. "I would," continues the Lord, "thou wert cold or hot; but because thou art lukewarm, and neither hot or cold, I will begin to vomit thee out of my mouth"—Ibid. "I would," he says, "thou wert cold;" that is, it were better for you to be altogether deprived of my grace; for then there would be stronger hopes of you repentance. But, remaining in a state of tepidity, you stand in greater danger of damnation; because you will easily fall from that state into mortal sin, and then there will be but little reason to hope for your resuscitation.

6. Speaking of a sinner not as yet converted, St. Gregory holds out hopes of repentance; but speaking of a tepid soul, who is not afraid of her imperfections, he despairs of her amendment. "Warmth, which has failed from fervour is in despair." The Son of God says: "Because thou art lukewarm, I will begin to vomit thee out of my mouth." A draught, when cold or hot, may be taken without repugnance; but when tepid, it is nauseous. The lukewarm Christian stands in great danger of being vomited forth by Almighty God, that is, of being forsaken by his grace. By the words, "I will begin to vomit thee out of my mouth," the Redeemer signified that he was ready to abandon the tepid soul: for what is vomited is taken back only with horror. But how does God begin to vomit the tepid religious out of his mouth? He ceases to give her the vivid lights of faith, the spiritual consolations, the holy desires, and the loving calls which he was accustomed to bestow upon her. Bereft of these blessings, she begins to neglect her meditations, communions, and visits to the Blessed Sacrament, or to discharge these duties with repugnance and distraction. She will perform all her exercises with reluctance, dissipation, and inquietude, and without devotion. Behold, how the Lord begins to vomit her out of his mouth. Thus the miserable soul, finding only pain and trouble, and no comfort in any of her exercises of piety, she finally abandons them all and falls into grievous sins. In a word, tepidity is a moral fever which is scarcely felt, but irremediably leads to death. The tepid soul never thinks of correcting her faults. She becomes so insensible to the stings of conscience, that, without perceiving her fall, she will be one day precipitated into eternal misery.

7. Then, the tepid religious will say, for me there is no hope of salvation. Because she will add, it is almost impossible for me to arise from my miserable state. But let her attend to the answer of Jesus Christ: "The things that are impossible with men are possible with God"—Luke, xviii. 27. What is impossible to man is not so to God. Whoever prays and adopts the necessary means obtains all graces. What are the necessary means? If your faults are sins of inadvertence or frailty, they do little injury to the soul as long as you detest them with humility. And here it is necessary to remark that two sorts of humility arise from our defects—the one holy, and the gift of God; and the other pernicious, and the offspring of the devil. The former is that by which the soul sees her imperfections, and is covered with confusion before God, and filled with a sense of her own nothingness. She is sorry for her faults; she detests them, but without being disturbed; and at the sight of her misery she is not discouraged or agitated; but, trusting in God, she resolves to atone for her imperfections by greater attention to her duties, and by greater fervour in works of piety. The other species of humility is that which fills the soul with agitation, with inquietude, and with diffidence, thus making her weak and almost incapable of doing good. "True humility," says St. Teresa, "though it makes the soul feel her own sinfulness, does not disturb her peace, but, on the contrary, infuses consolation. It fills, indeed, the heart with grief and affliction for having offended God, but, at the same time, inspires strong hopes of mercy. By such humility the soul is enlightened to see her own misery, and to praise God for having so long borne with her. But false humility, instilled by the devil, brings no light to make the soul do good, but represents God as a tyrant who will destroy all by fire and sword. Of all the deceitful inventions of the devil which I have known, this is the most subtle"—Vita, c. 30.

8. In the imperfections, then, which human weakness cannot avoid, as negligence is censurable, so excessive fear is reprehensible. "In such almost inevitable faults," says St. Bernard, "immoderate fear, as well as negligence, is culpable"—Serm. 1, in Cœna Dom. We should be sorry, but not lose courage, when we commit such faults: for God readily grants pardon when the soul detests them. "For the just man falls seven times, and shall rise again"—Prov. xxiv. 16. He that sins through frailty easily rises. "He falls and will rise again." St. Francis de Sales says, "as daily defects are indeliberately committed, so they are indeliberately taken away." St. Thomas teaches that such faults are cancelled "when the soul is fervently moved towards God"—(3 p. q. 87. a. 3)—that is, by acts of divine love, resignation, oblation, and by similar works, which spiritual souls are accustomed to perform. The angelic doctor adds—(ibid.)—"the sacramentalia; such as to recite the Pater noster, the Confiteor; to strike the breast; to receive the benediction of the bishop; to sprinkle one self with holy water; and to pray in a consecrated church, produce the remission of such venial defects." The sacraments, but especially the Holy Eucharist, have particular efficacy to remit venial sins. "The mind," says St. Bernardine of Sienna, "may be so absorbed in devotion by receiving the holy communion, that the soul will be purified from all venial sin"—Ser. 4, art. 3, cap. 2.

9. This is true with regard to indeliberate sins. If a religious should have the misfortune to commit, sometimes, but not often, a deliberate venial sin, she should not even then lose courage, or let the peace of her soul be disturbed.

Let her endeavour immediately to repair her fault by repentance, and by a strong determination not to be guilty of it again. Whenever she relapses, her sorrow and resolution should be renewed, and all her confidence placed in God, who, if she continues to act in this way after every fault, will finally deliver her from such deliberate sins. St. Philip Neri used to say, "to become a Saint is not the business of a day." Whoever leaves not the road of perfection in which he began to walk, ought not to despond, for he will ultimately arrive in sanctity. To convince us of our weakness, to show us that without his aid and protection we should fall into the greatest crimes, God sometimes permits us to commit deliberate venial sins. Such faults, then, though voluntary, provided they be unfrequent, do not seriously injure the soul, or at least they do not bring her into ruin. But light sins, which are deliberate and habitual, easily lead the soul into perdition, particularly when they are committed through attachment to any passion, and without sorrow or efforts of amendment; for they show that the soul has fallen into a state of tepidity, from which, as we have already seen, it is very difficult to recover. But if a religious should be so unfortunate as to have fallen into such a state, let her attend to the following means of emerging from it.

10. The first means is a true desire of being delivered from her miserable condition. If she feel not that desire, she ought at least to beg it of God, trusting in his promises to give us whatsoever we ask. "Ask, and you shall receive." The second is to search out her defects, particularly her predominant failing. If, for example, she is full of self-esteem; if she frequently speaks in tones of authority; if she is addicted to self-praise; if she is disturbed by every humiliation and inattention from others, then she may conclude that pride is her ruling passion. Self-love will predominate in some who are afflicted at every little infirmity, who are annoyed at every inconvenience, and who always seek to gratify their palate, and cannot bear any food which is not agreeable to their taste. In others anger is the prevailing fault: they are provoked by every contradiction, and complain of the conduct of all who thwart their inclinations. Others, for every trivial cause, neglect mental prayer, communion, the choir, and other similar duties: in them sloth holds the ascendancy.

11. Thirdly, as soon as she shall have discovered her predominant passion, a religious should make a strong resolution to free herself from it, and to contend with it till it is completely vanquished. "Thou shalt," says the Lord,

"utterly destroy them"—Deut. vii. 2. "God," says St. Teresa, "requires of us only strong resolutions; he himself will do the rest." In another place she asserts that the devil is afraid of resolute souls; but he fears not those who, though they desire perfection, never resolve to become Saints. Again, the Saint says, "God cheerfully lends his aid to all, however great their sinfulness may be, who, with a firm resolution, consecrate themselves entirely to his love. The meditations of a religious should be always concluded by strong resolutions. "Short prayer," says St. Teresa, "which produces great effects, is better than prayer continued for many years, but devoid of holy resolutions." And of what use is the meditation in which we are content with certain devout affections, and certain general petitions made through habit, but in which we never resolve to correct the faults we know to be an obstacle to our spiritual advancement?

12. The fourth and most necessary means is to remove as much as possible the occasions of defects. The devil laughs at all our resolutions and promises of amendment, as long as we expose ourselves to the occasions of sin. He once said that of all instructions that which treated on avoiding the occasions of sin was the most displeasing to him. A religious, then, should endeavour to discover the cause of her defects; she ought to examine if they arise from familiarity with any person within or without the monastery; from remaining in such a place; from keeping up a correspondence by letters or by presents, or from similar causes. St. Teresa says, "if a soul does not relinquish worldly diversion she will soon begin to fall back in the way of the Lord; and that if all sinful occasions be taken away she will advance rapidly in the love of God." This great saint also says, that a religious should communicate her temptations only to those who love perfection. If she disclose them to imperfect souls she will do injury to herself and to others.

13. The fifth means is to be particularly exact in performing acts of the virtues opposed to the evil inclinations which are most troublesome to her, and which most frequently lead her into defects. For example, if she is prone to pride, she should take particular care to humble herself before all, and to bear patiently all humiliations which she receives from others. If she is addicted to greediness, she ought to abstain as much as possible from indulgence of appetite. They that are inclined to other defects should adopt similar means of conquering them. It will also, as Cassian observes, be very useful to represent to ourselves, in time of mental prayer, the occasions which may occur, as, for example, any insult or injury which we are likely to receive, and then to resolve to humble ourselves, and to be resigned to the divine will. Such previous resolutions (except with regard to temptations against chastity) prepare the soul for unforeseen contradictions. It was by this means that the saints were always prepared to bear with peace and joy all the derision, injuries, stripes, and injustices which they received.

14. The sixth means is to make the particular examen on the predominant passion, and to perform some penance as often as we yield to it. We must never cease to combat this passion until it is completely conquered; we must trust in the divine aid, and say with holy David: "I will pursue after my enemies, and overtake them; and I will not turn again till they are consumed"—Ps. xvii. 38. I will prosecute my enemies; I will beat them down, and will not cease to combat them till they are destroyed. Remember that, however great your progress in virtue may be, it would be a fatal delusion to imagine that your passions are dead, for, although they may be extinguished for a time, they will again spring up, as long as you remain in the body. "How much soever," says St. Bernard, "you have advanced here below, you err if you think your vices are not only suppressed but dead"—Serm. 58, in Cant. Hence Cassian observes, that to prevent the passions you have subdued from resuming their sway, it is necessary to watch continually; if you slacken your exertions they will return, and rule your soul with still greater despotism.

15. To overcome any defect, it is necessary, above all, to distrust altogether our own strength and exertions, and to place entire confidence in God, saying with David: "For I will not trust in my bow; neither shall my sword save me"—Ps. xliii. 7. If we confide in our own resolution and exertions our labour will be lost. We must, therefore, pray without ceasing for the divine assistance, continually crying out, "Have mercy on me, O Lord; assist me, O my God." Jesus Christ has promised, that he who asks shall receive, and that he who seeks shall find (Luke xi. 9); but to obtain God's gifts we must pray, and never cease to pray. "We ought," says the Redeemer, "always to pray, and not to faint"—Luke, xviii. 1. Whenever we give up prayer, we shall be defeated; but if we persevere in prayer, with a true desire of receiving the graces of God, though as yet we have not been conquerors, the victory shall ultimately belong to us.

PRAYER.

O my Jesus, look not on my ingratitude to thee, after all thy mercies, but turn thy eyes to thy own merits, and to the pains thou hast suffered for me, from the crib of Bethlehem to the cross of Calvary. I repent, with my whole soul, of all the offences I have offered to thee. From this moment I consecrate to thee my life, which I desire to spend in doing all that I can to obey and to love thee. I love thee, O my Redeemer, but I love thee too little; for thy mercy's sake increase in me thy love. Hear my prayer, O Jesus, and make me continue to repeat this prayer. O love of my soul, O that my heart may burn continually with thy love. I have offended thee grievously; but for the future I desire to love thee intensely. I desire to love thee alone, because thou alone deservest to be loved above all things; and I desire to love thee for no other reason than because thou art worthy of all love. O Mary, my mother and my hope, assist me.

CHAPTER VII.

On Interior Mortification, or abnegation of self-love.

1. THERE are two sorts of self-love—the one good, the other pernicious. The former is that which makes us seek eternal life—the end of our creation; the latter inclines us to pursue earthly goods, and to prefer them to our everlasting welfare and to the holy will of God. "The celestial Jerusalem," says St. Augustine, "is built up by the loving God so as to condemn oneself; but the earthly city is raised by loving self so as to despise Almighty God"—Lib. 14, de civ. c. 28. Hence, Jesus Christ has said: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself"—Matt. xvi. 24. Christian perfection, then, consists in self-abnegation. Whoever denies not himself cannot be a follower of Jesus Christ. "The augmentation of charity," says St. Augustine, "is the diminution of cupidity; the perfection of charity is its destruction"—Lib. 83, q. 36. The less, then, a Christian desires to indulge passion, the more he will love God; and if he seeks nothing but God he will then possess perfect charity. But, in the present state of corrupt nature, it is not possible to be quite free from the molestation of self-love. Jesus alone, among men, and Mary alone, among women, have been free from its suggestions. All the other Saints had to combat their irregular passions. The only care of a religious should be to restrain the inordinate inclinations of self-love. "To regulate the motions of the soul is," as St. Augustine says, "the office of interior mortification."

2. Unhappy the soul that suffers herself to be ruled by her own inclinations. "A domestic enemy," says St. Bernard, "is the worst of foes"—De Anim. cap. 15. The devil and the world continually seek our destruction, but self-love is a still more dangerous enemy. "Self-love," says St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, "is like a worm which corrodes the roots of a plant, deprives us not only of fruit but of life"—Vita, par. 3. In another place she says: "Self-love is the most deceitful of all enemies: like Judas, it betrays us with the kiss of peace. Whoever overcomes it conquers all. He that cannot cut it off by a single stroke should at least endeavour to destroy it by degrees." We must pray continually in the language of Solomon, "Give me not over to a shameless and foolish mind"—Eccl. xxiii. 6. O my God, do not abandon me to my passions, that seek to destroy in my soul your holy fear, and even to deprive me of the use of reason.

3. Our whole life must be one continued contest. "The life of man upon earth is a warfare"—Job, vii. 1. Now, he that is placed in the front of battle must be always prepared for attack; as soon as he ceases to defend himself he is conquered. And here it is necessary to remark that the soul should never cease to combat her passions, however great her victories over them may have been: for human passions, though conquered a thousand times, never die. "Believe me," says St. Bernard, "that after being cut off they bud forth again, and after being put to flight they return"—In Cant. Ser. 58. Hence, by struggling with concupiscence we can only render its attacks less frequent, and more easy to be subdued. A certain monk complained to the Abbot Theodore that he had contended for eight years with his passions, and that still they were not extinguished. "Brother," replied the abbot, "you complain of a warfare of eight years, and I have spent seventy years in solitude, and during all that time I have not been for one day free from the assaults of passion." We shall be subject during our lives to the molestation of our passions. "But," as St. Gregory says, it is one thing to look at these monsters, and another to shelter them in our hearts"—Mor. lib. vi. cap. 16. It is one thing to hear them roar, and another to admit them into our souls, and suffer them to devour us.

4. The human soul is a barren soil in which useless and noxious herbs constantly spring up: we must therefore, by the practice of holy mortification, continually hold the mattock in our hands to root them up and banish them from our hearts; otherwise our souls shall become an uncultivated waste, covered with briars and thorns. "Conquer yourself," was an expression always on the lips of St. Ignatius Loyola, and the text of his familiar discourses to his religious. Conquer self-love and break down your own wills. "Few" (he would say), "of those who practice mental prayer become saints, because few of them endeavour to overcome themselves." "Of a hundred persons," says the Saint, "devoted to prayer, more than ninety are self-willed." Hence, he preferred an act of mortification of self-will to long prayer, accompanied with many spiritual consolations. "What does it avail," says Gilbert, "to close the gates, if famine—the internal enemy—produce general affliction?"—Serm. 26, in Cant. What does it profit us to mortify the exterior senses, and to perform exercises of devotion, while, at the same time, we cherish in our hearts rancour, ambition, attachment to self-will and to self-esteem, or any other passion which brings ruin on the soul?

5. St. Francis Borgia says that prayer introduces the love of God into the soul, but mortification prepares a place for it, by banishing from the heart earthly affections—the most powerful obstacles to charity. Whoever goes for water to the fountain must cleanse the vessel of the earth which it may contain; otherwise he will bring back mire instead of water. "Prayer without mortification," says Father Balthassar Alvarez, "is either an illusion, or lasts but for short time." And St. Ignatius asserts that a mortified Christian acquires a more perfect union with God in a quarter of an hour's prayer than an unmortified soul does by praying for several hours. Hence, whenever he heard that any one spent a great deal of time in mental prayer, he said: "It is a sign that he practices great mortification."

6. There are some religious who perform a great many exercises of devotion, who practice frequent communion, long meditations, fasting, and other corporal austerities, but make no effort to overcome certain little passions—for example, certain resentments, aversions; curiosity, and certain dangerous affections. They will not submit to any contradiction; they will not give up attachment to certain persons, nor subject their will to the commands of their superiors, or to the holy will of God. What progress can they make in perfection? Unhappy souls! they shall be always imperfect; always out of the way of sanctity. "They," says St. Augustine, "run well, but out of the way." They imagine that they run well because they practice works of piety which their own self-will suggests; but they shall be for ever out of the way of perfection, which consists in conquering self. "Thou shalt advance," says the devout a-Kempis, "in proportion to the violence thou shalt have offered to thyself." I do not censure vocal prayer, or acts of penance, or other spiritual works. But, because all exercises of devotion are but means of practicing virtue, the soul should seek in them only the conquest of her passions. Hence, in communions, meditations, visits to the blessed sacrament, and other similar exercises, we ought always to beseech Almighty God to give us strength to practice humility, mortification, obedience, and conformity to his holy will. In every Christian, it is a defect to act from a motive of self-satisfaction. But in a religious, who makes a particular profession of perfection and mortification, it is a much greater fault. "God," says Lactantius, "calls to life by labour: the devil, to death by delights"—Lib. vi. de Prov. cap. 18. The Lord brings his servants to eternal life by mortification; but the devil leads sinners to everlasting death by pleasure and self-indulgence.

7. Even works of piety must be undertaken with a spirit of detachment: so that whenever our efforts are unsuccessful we will not be disturbed, and when our exercises of devotion are prohibited by the superior, we will give them up with cheerfulness. Self-attachment of every kind hinders perfect union with God. We must, therefore, seriously and firmly resolve to mortify our passions, and not to submit to be their slaves. External as well as interior mortification is necessary for perfection: but with this difference, that the former should be practiced with discretion; the latter without discretion and with fervour. What does it profit us to mortify the body, while the passions of the heart are indulged? "Of what use is it," says St. Jerome, "to reduce the body by abstinence, if the soul is swelled with pride?—or to abstain from wine, and to be inebriated with hatred?"—Epie. ad Lætantiam. It is useless to chastise the body by fasting, while pride inflates the heart to such a degree, that we cannot bear a word of contempt, or the refusal of a request. In vain do we abstain from wine, while the soul is intoxicated with anger against all who thwart our designs or oppose our inclinations. No wonder that St. Bernard deplored the state of religious who wear the external garb of humility, and at the same time inwardly cherish their passions. "They," says the saint, "are not divested of their vices—they only cover them by the outward sign of penance."

8. By attention to the mortification of self-love, we shall become saints in a short time, and without risk of injury to health: for, since God is the only witness of interior acts, they will not expose us to the danger of being puffed up with pride. Oh! what treasures of virtue and merits are laid up by stifling, in their very birth, those little inordinate desires and affections, those bickerings, those suggestions of curiosity, those bursts of wit and humor, and all similar effects of self-love. When you are contradicted, give up your opinion with cheerfulness, unless the glory of God require that you maintain it. When feelings of self-esteem spring up in your heart, make a sacrifice of them to Jesus Christ. If you receive a letter, restrain your curiosity, and abstain from opening it for some time. If you desire to read the termination of an interesting narrative, lay aside the book and defer the reading to another time. When you feel inclined to mirth, to pull a flower, or to look at any object, suppress the inclination for the love of Jesus Christ, and deprive yourself for his sake of the pleasure of indulging it. A thousand acts of this kind may be performed in the day. Father Leonard of Port Maurice relates, that a servant of God performed eight acts of mortification in eating an egg, and that it was afterwards revealed to her that, as the reward of her self-denial, eight degress of grace and as many of glory were bestowed upon her. It is also narrated of St. Dositheus, that, by similar mortifications of the interior, he arrived in a short time at a high degree of perfection. Though unable, in consequence of bodily infirmities, to fast or to discharge the other duties of the community, he attained so perfect an union with God, that the other monks, struck with wonder at his sublime sanctity, asked him what exercises of virtue he performed. "The exercise," replied the saint, "to which I have principally attended is the mortification of self-will."

9. Blessed Joseph Calasanctius used to say, "the day which is spent without mortification is lost." To convince us of the necessity of mortification, the Redeemer has chosen a life of self-denial, full of pains and ignominy, and destitute of sensible pleasures. Hence, he is called by Isaias, "a man of sorrows." He might have saved the world amid the enjoyment of honours and delights; but he preferred to redeem it by sorrows and contempt. "Who having joy set before him, endured the cross"—Heb. xii. 2. To give us an example, he renounced the joy which was set before, and embraced the cross. "Reflect again, and again," says St. Bernard, "on the life of Jesus, and you will find him always on the cross." The Redeemer revealed to St. Catherine of Bologna, that the sorrows of his passion commenced in his mother's womb. For his birth he selected the season, the place, and the hour most calculated to excite pain. During life he chose to be poor, unknown, despised; and dying, he preferred the most painful, the most ignominious, and the most desolate of deaths which human nature could suffer. St. Catherine of Sienna used to say, that "as a mother takes the bitterest medicine to restore the health of the infant she suckles, so Jesus Christ has assumed all the pains of life to heal the infirmities of his children."

10. Thus he invites all his followers to accompany him to the mountain of myrrh; that is, of bitterness and sorrows. "I will go to the mountain of myrrh"—Cant. iv. 6. Behold he invites us to follow him if we wish for his company. "Do you come," says St. Peter Damian, "to Jesus crucified? If you do, you must come already crucified, or to be crucified"—Ser. 1 de exalt. S. Cruc. If, O sacred spouse, you come to embrace your crucified Saviour, you must bring with you a heart already crucified, or to be crucified. Speaking especially of his virginal spouses, Jesus Christ said to blessed Baptist Varani: "The crucified Bridegroom desires a crucified spouse." Hence, to be the true spouses of Jesus, religious must lead lives of continual mortification and self-denial. "Always bearing about in our body the mortification of Jesus"—2 Cor. iv. 10. They must never seek their own satisfaction in any action or desire, but the pleasure of Jesus Christ, crucifying for his sake all inclinations. "They that are Christ's have crucified their flesh with the vices and concupiscences"—Gal. v. 24. Religious, if they expect to be recognised as the spouses of the Redeemer, must transfix all their passions.

11. Let us see what are the means by which the spirit of interior mortification may be acquired. The first is to discover the passion which predominates in our heart, and which most frequently leads us into sin; and then to endeavour to conquer it. St. Gregory says that to overcome the devil we must avail ourselves of the artifices by which he seeks our destruction. He labours continually to increase in us the violence of the passion to which we are most subject; and we must direct our attention principally to the extirpation of that passion. Whoever subdues his predominant passion will easily conquer all other evil inclinations: but he that is under its sway can make no progress in perfection. "Of what advantage," says St. Ephrem, "are wings to the eagle when his foot his chained?" Oh! how many religious are there who, like the royal eagle, are capable of lofty flights in the way of God, and who, because they are bound by earthly attachments, never fly and never advance in holiness. St. John of the Cross says that a slender thread is sufficient to fetter a soul that flies not with eagerness to God. Besides, he that submits to the tyranny of any passion, not only does not go forward in the way of virtue, but is exposed to great danger of being lost. If a religious neglects to subdue her ruling passion, other mortifications shall be unprofitable to her. Some despise worldly riches, but are full of self-esteem. If they do not endeavour to bear the humiliations they receive, their contempt of mammon will profit them little. Others, on the contrary, are patient and humble, but enslaved to the love of money. If they do not mortify the desire of wealth, their patience and humility in bearing with contempt will be of little use to them.

12. O sacred virgin, resolve, then, with a resolute will, to subdue the evil inclination which is most predominant in your heart. A resolute will, aided by the grace of God (which is never wanting,) conquers all difficulties. St. Francis de Sales was very prone to anger; but, by continual violence to himself, he became a model of meekness and of sweetness. We read in his life that he bore, without murmur or complaint, the injuries and calumnies which, to try his patience, were, by divine permission, heaped upon him. As soon as one passion is subdued we must endeavour to overcome others: for a single unmortified passion will be sufficient to lead the soul to destruction. St. Joseph Calasanctius asserts that while "a single passion reigns in a heart, though all the others should have been extirpated, the soul shall never enjoy tranquility." "A ship," says St. Cyril, "however strong and perfect it may be, will be unsafe while the smallest hole remains in the bottom"—Ap. S. Augus. Ep. 206. And St. Augustine says: "Trample under foot passions already subdued, and combat those that still offer resistance"—In cap. 8. Rom. If you wish to be a saint, I advise you to entreat the superior and director to point out the way in which you ought to walk. Tell them not to spare you, but to contradict your inclinations as often as they shall judge it useful to you. "Be of an upright and perfect will," says that great servant of God, Cardinal Petrucci. St. Teresa relates that she derived more advantage from one confessor, who sought on all occasions to oppose her desires, than from all the others. She adds, that she was frequently tempted to leave him; and that as often as she yielded to the suggestion of the devil, God rebuked her severely. "Every time," says the saint, "I resolved to leave him, I felt within me a rebuke more painful than the conduct of my confessor towards me."

PRAYER.

O my God, after so many graces, so many communions, so many good examples of companions, and so many interior lights and loving invitations, my whole soul should at this moment be one flame of divine love. But, notwithstanding all thy favours, I am still as imperfect and miserable as ever. Nothing has been wanting on thy part; the fault is entirely mine, and is to be ascribed to the obstacles which I have opposed to thy grace by obeying my passions. I see, O my Jesus, that my life has not given glory to thee, but has rather brought dishonour on thy name, by exhibiting to others one of thy spouses so attached to the world and to herself. Thou hast taken me from the world, and I have loved it more than even seculars. O Lord, have mercy upon me, do not abandon me, for I desire to amend. I repent with all my heart of the insults which, for the indulgence of my pleasures, I offered to thee. I desire to begin to love thee. I have abused thy patience too long, but now I love thee with my whole soul. From this day forward thou shalt be the only object of my affections. I desire to leave all, and to do everything in my power to please thee. Show me thy will, and assist me to execute it; I am ready to please thee in all things. Do not permit me to be any longer insensible to the excessive love by which thou hast obliged me to love thee. I am willing to be deprived of every earthly consolation, and to suffer every cross which thou wilt please to send me. Dispose of me as thou pleasest. I desire and hope to belong to thee entirely and for ever. I desire thee alone, and nothing more. Mary, my mother, beg of thy Son to hear me; for he denies thee nothing. Amen.

SECTION I.

On detachment from self-will.

Nothing is more injurious to religious who have consecrated their will to Jesus Christ than to be guided by the dictates of their own will. Hence, to guard against this enemy of the spirit—self-will—the vow of obedience has been prescribed in every religious order. Nothing but self-will can separate us from God. Neither all the men upon earth nor all the devils in hell can deprive us of his grace. "Let self-will cease," says St. Bernard, "and there will be no hell"—de Ord. Vitæ. Let men give up their wills, and for them there shall be no hell. It is self-will that destroys all virtues. St. Peter Damian calls it "the great destroyer of all virtues;" and St. Anselm says, "the will of God is the fountain of all good, and the will of man the source of all evil." And what fruit can be expected from the disciple who chooses a master destitute of reason, that is his own will? "Whoever," says St. Bernard, "constitutes himself his own master becomes the disciple of a fool." St. Anthony used to say "self-love is that wine which inebriates man, so as to render him incapable of comprehending the the value of virtue or the evil of sin."

2. St. Augustine asserts, "the devil has been made a devil by self-will." It is principally by self-will that Satan seeks to effect the perdition of religious. Cassian relates that the Abbot Achilles, being asked by his disciples with what arms the devil fights against religious, replied, that he employs pride against the great; avarice against merchants; intemperance against youth; but that his principal weapons against religious are their own wills; that with these he frequently defeats them. The Abbot Pastor says, that "the demons do not contend with us when we do our own will, for then our wills become devils"—Apud. Ruf. lib. 3. When we do our will the enemy ceases to combat us; because then our wills are devils more injurious to us than all the devils in hell. St. John Climacus (quoted by Gerson) says that "he who, despising the authority of his superior, wishes to direct himself, does not require a devil to tempt him, because he is become a devil to himself"—Gers. de vis. cap. 8.

3. "Go not," says the Holy Ghost, "after thy lusts, but turn from thy own will"—Eccl. xviii. 30. Do not follow your own desires, but fly from the indulgence of self-will. This admonition is directed in a particular manner to religious who have sacrificed their wills to God, by promising obedience to their rule and to their superior. As God should be the only object of their love, so obedience is the only means by which they can obtain his love. To be the fruit of obedience is the highest perfection which the actions of a religious can attain. The venerable Catherine of Cardona, having left the Spanish court, retired into the desert, where she lived for many years in the practice of penitential austerities, the very recital of which would fill the mind with horror. In her life it is related, that seeing one day a discalced Carmelite carrying, through obedience, a bundle of wood, and knowing by inspiration that he murmured interiorly against the command of his superior, she thus addressed him: "Brother, carry, carry with alacrity these faggots; and be assured that by this act of obedience you shall merit a greater reward than I have deserved by all my penances." But, as the works of a religious derive from obedience the highest degree of perfection, so by self-will they are rendered most defective. Hence, Tritemius says, that "nothing is more hateful to the devil than the practice of obedience." "The devil detests nothing more than obedience"—In prol. Reg. S. Bon. Speaking of obedience, St. Teresa says, that "Satan knows that it is the remedy of the soul, and therefore he labors hard to prevent its attainment." When St. Francis de Sales was devising the rules for the nuns of the Visitation, a certain person said, that "they ought to be barefooted." "You," replied the Saint, "wish to commence with the feet, but I wish to begin with the head." St. Philip Neri continually impressed on his penitents that sanctity consists in the mortification of self-will. "You will," says St. Jerome, "advance in proportion as you deny your own will." Your progress in virtue will be proportional to your denial of self-will. It was because they knew that they could not offer to God a more agreeable sacrifice than that of their own wills, by the vow of obedience, that so many parish priests and bishops, who led exemplary lives in the world, retired into the cloister to live under obedience.

4. Oh! how happy the religious who, at the hour of death, can say, with the Abbot John, "I have never done my own will." St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that "the only means of dying a happy death, is to submit with simplicity to the direction of a superior. "To crucify all her desires is," says Cassian, "the end of a religious." The religious, then, who does not attend to the mortification of self-will cannot be called a religious, but a sacrilegious violator of her profession. What greater sacrilege than to take back a will which has been once consecrated to God? "There is not," says St. Bernard, "a more heinous sacrilege than to resume power over a will once offered to God." The Holy Ghost has declared, by the mouth of Samuel, that to violate obedience, and to follow self-will, in contempt of authority, is a species of idolatry. "It is like the sin of witchcraft to rebel; and like the crime of idolatry to refuse to obey"—1 Kings xv. 23. St. Gregory applies this passage in a particular manner to the disobedience of religious. "It is," says the Saint, "like the sin of witchcraft to rebel, because they believe the proud inventions of their own hearts, and resist the counsels of their prelates"—S. Greg. in loc. cit. The sin of religious who despise the commands of superiors, and follow the dictates of self-love, is like the crime of idolatry; because they in a manner adore self-will as their God. Hence, St. Basil ordamned that monks who were attached to their own wills should, like lepers, be separated from the rest of the community, lest others might be infected by their bad example.

5. Blessed Charlotte used to say that the mortification of self-will is more meritorious than the renunciation of all the riches of the world. And here it is right to observe that sanctity depends on the abnegation of self-will, not only in what is imperfect or indifferent, but also in the exercises which have the appearance of virtue; as, for example, prayers, alms-deeds, acts of penance, and other works of piety. Cassian remarks, that acts of virtue performed through self-will and disobedience are productive of the worst consequences; because sinful actions, which wear the appearance of holiness, are corrected only with the greatest difficulty." "Vices," he says, "which appear to be virtues, are the most irremediable"—Cass. Coll. iv. cap. 20. Religious who desire to attain sanctity by following self-will are precisely the souls who, according to Isaias, will say to Jesus Christ on the day of judgment: "Why have we fasted, and thou hast not regarded?"—Isaia. lviii. 3. To them the Judge will answer, that their works were performed to please themselves rather than to do the will of God, and that, therefore, they deserve no reward. "Behold," he will say, "in the day of your fast your own will is found"—Ibid. Oh! how great, then, is the evil of self-will, which vitiates and destroys the most perfect actions? "Great," says St. Bernard, "is the evil of self-will, which renders your good works unprofitable to you." But, on the other hand, to be the result of obedience is the infallible sign that an action is pleasing to God. Nicephorus relates, that when the superiors of St. Simon Stylites wished to ascertain if the extraordinary and singular life which he led, remaining on a pillar in the open air, night and day, were pleasing to God, they commanded him to come down from his pillar and to live with other monks. On hearing the precept, the Saint instantly stretched out his foot to descend, but was told by his superiors to persevere in his austerities, which he proved by his obedience to be acceptable before God. It is necessary, then, to seek even holy things without attachment to self-will. St. Francis de Sales used to say, "I desire but few things, and for these I am not solicitous." He wished for them not through self-love, but to please God, and was therefore prepared to give them up as soon as he knew they were not conformable to the holy will of God.

6. Oh! how great is the peace of a religious whose desires are the dictates of obedience? St. Dositheus having consecrated his whole will to obedience, enjoyed continual peace. Fearing that in this peace there was some delusion of the enemy, he one day said to his superior, St. Dorotheus: "Father, tell me why it is that I experience such tranquillity as to be free from every other desire?" "My son," replied the father, "this peace is altogether the fruit of obedience." And what can give more content to religious that love God than to know, with certainty, that in all their actions they do the will of God? They can say with the prophet: "We are happy, O Israel, because the things that are pleasing to God are made known to us"—Bar. iv. 4. We enjoy constant happiness, because being obedient in all things we are certain of doing in all the will of our spouse. "Oh! what sweetness," says Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, "is contained in this expression—the will of God." St. Peter Damian says, that "he who has rejected his own will has thrown off a most grievous burden." "What tyrant," says this Saint, "more cruel than self-will?" A religious cannot be subject to a more galling tyranny than the dominion of her own will; for her inclinations will lead her to seek after things which cannot be had in the cloister. Fruitless desires will keep her in perpetual misery and agitation of mind, and she will frequently suffer within herself a little hell. "Of what use," says St. Eucherius, "is the silence of a habitation, if the inhabitants be distured by the struggling of passions? Of what use is external serenity if the tempest range within?"—Hom. 9, admonac. What will it profit a religious to live in the retirement of the cloister, if her heart be agitated by the conflicts of her passions? Without, indeed, there will be a calm, but within a storm.

7. And from what source arise all our troubles? Do they not spring from attachment to our own inclinations? "Whence," says St. Bernard, "is disturbance of mind, if not from following self-will?" Cassian relates that the ancient fathers were accustomed to say that the religious who does not conquer self-will cannot persevere with profit and with peace. Attachment to self-will is the only reason why many religious lead an unhappy life. One is unhappy because she cannot have the confessor or superior of her choice; another because she desires an office, and it is not given to her. She is so discontented that the superiors to put an end to her complaints, accede to her wishes; and still she is not content. How can she expect to enjoy peace when, instead of practicing obedience, she obliges her superiors to submit to her desires? Others are disturbed because an occupation opposed to their inclinations is assigned to them; others because they are forbidden to keep up a certain communication or correspondence with their friends. Others because some disagreeable precept is imposed upon them: they are displeased, and endeavour to excite against the superior the aversion of their relatives, and even of the community, and thus produce endless scandal and disorder. Their crime would merit the chastisement of two monks, who refused to receive as their abbot a holy man called Philibert: one of them was struck with lightning, the other suddenly attacked with a mortal disease. "Have peace with your prelates," says St. Bernard: "do not detract, nor wilfully listen to others detracting them; for God punishes inferiors in a special manner for this vice, and even in the present life"—Opusc. ad quid ven. And St. Gregory says, that "the works of superiors, though they may appear reprehensible, are not to be struck with the sword of the tongue"—In registror. lib. xii. c. 3. "Thou shalt not," says the Lord, "speak ill of the Gods" —Exod. xxii. 28. You shall not censure the conduct of your superiors, who hold the place of God in your regard.

8. Attend to what Mary Magdalene, while in an ecstasy, said of the evil done to religious by self-love. "I see," says the great saint, "a multitude of souls, among whom there is one who, at the time of uniting herself with you, O Divine Word, is wholly recollected; but before the lapse of an hour something occurs which is opposed to her inclinations, and she is thrown into confusion and agitation. I see another who, during the holy mass, burns with divine love; but when reminded of a fault she will not acknowledge it; in her pride and self-love reign. Another appears to rival St. Anthony by the rigour of her austerities; but if her penances be prohibited she is pertinacious, and will not obey. Another is reserved and mortified in the refectory; but she takes complacency in her mortifications, and desires to be esteemed more holy than her companions. To her discretion appears excess; but she imputes to immoderate zeal the want of anything which she desires. Another will appear in the parlour to surpass St. Augustine by her wisdom, and, to manifest her own perfection, will exhibit in her conversation an extraordinary degree of prudence. Others are ready to forego, in the exercise of charity, every personal advantage, but wish to be thanked for their services, and to be praised by all their companions." Of such religious the Lord once said to the same saint: "They desire my Spirit, but they desire it in a manner and at a time pleasing to themselves, and thus they render themselves unfit to receive it."

9. But let us return to ourselves. If you, O blessed sister, wish to become a saint, and to enjoy continual peace, seek to overcome as much as possible your own will; adopt the rule of religious who love perfection; never do anything for your own satisfaction, but do all to please God: by this means you cut off all vain desires and all evil inclinations. Worldlings continually seek the gratification of their own wishes; but the saints constantly endeavour to mortify self-will, and to find occasions of self-denial. St. Andrew Avellini, as we read in his office, bound himself by an express vow to resist continually his own will. You should at least prescribe to yourself to deny your own will a certain number of times in the day. Repeat often the words by which St. Bernard was accustomed to excite his fervour in God's service: "Bernard, for what purpose have you come here?" Say to yourself: Have I entered religion to do my own will? If I wish to live according to my own inclinations, I should have remained in the world. At my profession I consecrated my will to God by the vow of obedience: why should I now seek to indulge it? Why am I disturbed when not permitted to follow my own will? Be not troubled, then, when your requests are refused, and when a duty painful to self-love is imposed upon you; but remember that by your obedience you will merit a greater reward, and will make greater progress in virtue, than you would by many spontaneous acts of penance and devotion. A great servant of God used to say, that to perform a single act of abnegation of self-will is more profitable than to build a thousand hospitals. Have continually before your eyes the words of the venerable Father Anthony Torres to a religious who was one of his penitents: "A soul entirely consecrated to God loves nothing; wants nothing; seeks nothing; desires nothing."

10. I will conclude this chapter by an extract from a letter of the same venerable author to a religious whom he wished to detach from herself and from all created objects, in order to love nothing but God: "Since the Lord gives you so many occasions of suffering and desolation, endeavour to improve in charity, which is said to be as strong as death. Study to strengthen divine love in your soul, so that it may disengage your heart from all creatures, from all human respect, from all that is prized by the world, from your own desires, and from all self-love, that there may be nothing in you to prevent your thoughts, your desires, and your affections from being entirely directed to your beloved. Let the heart sigh after the beloved; let the will rest only on him: let the thoughts be wholly fixed on him. Let every motion of the body, let every act of your life, be for and with the beloved. To attain the love of your beloved, I advise you to renounce, every day before the crucifix, every object of your affections, all honours, interests, consolations, and relatives, and to protest that you desire no other glory than his ignominies; no riches but his charity; no other convenience than the cross; that you desire him only, your dear and beloved spouse. When you walk in the garden, or look up to the heavens, invite frequently with your whole heart all creatures to love your beloved. Avoid all conversation; give up every employment which is not pleasing to him; omit every action which will not redound to the glory of your spouse."

PRAYER.

Ah, my God, my Lord, and my spouse! Thou hast loved me so much, and hast given me a will to love thee, and I have so often employed this will in offending and insulting thee. If I were not convinced that thou art a God of infinite mercy, I should lose all hope of recovering thy grace, which I have unfortunately lost. By my ingratitude I deserved to have been long since abandoned by thee. But, I see that thy light still assists me, and I know that thou dost still call me thy love. Behold, O Lord, I do not wish to continue any longer in my ingratitude, or to resist any longer thy invitation. I offer thee my whole being: receive an unfaithful soul who, for so many years, has despised thy love, but who now desires to love thee, and to belong entirely to thee. Assist me, O my Jesus; give me a sorrow for my sins which will fill my soul with pain and anguish for having outraged so good and so amiable a God. Unhappy me, if, after the lights which thou now givest me, I betray thee again. How canst thou bear with me any longer? The fear of again offending thee afflicts my soul. Ah, Lord! do not permit me to be evermore separated from thee. Chastise me as thou pleasest, but not by permitting me to lose thy grace. If thou seest that I shall ever turn my back upon thee, take me out of life this moment, in which I hope to enjoy thy friendship. Of what use will life be to me, if, by living, I continue to offend thee? O Mary, my hope, obtain for me the grace of perseverance, or of instant death. Amen.

SECTION II.

On Obedience.

"SINCE," as St. Bonaventure says, "all the perfection of religious consists in the destruction of self-will," obedience should, of all virtues, be the most dear to religious. Obedience to rule and to the commands of superiors is the greatest sacrifice which a Christian can offer to God: because, as St. Thomas says, "nothing is more amiable in the eyes of man than the liberty of his own will"—Opusc. 18, de perf. c. 10. Hence, we cannot present to God a more acceptable gift than the consecration of our wills to his service. "For," says the Holy Ghost, "obedience is better than sacrifices"—1 Kings xv. 22. Obedience is more pleasing to God than all the sacrifices we can offer to him. They who give to the Lord their worldly goods by almsdeeds, their honour by embracing comtempt, and their body by mortification, by fasts, and by works of penance, make only a partial consecration of themselves to him. But he that offers to God the sacrifice of his own will, by the practice of obedience, consecrates all he possesses to God's glory, and can say: Lord, after having given to you my will, I have nothing more to present to you. Besides, as St. Gregory says, "by the other virtues we give to God what belongs to us; but by obedience we dedicate ourselves to him"—Lib. vi. in Reg. c. 2. The same father says, in another place, that "obedience is a virtue which infuses the other virtues into the mind, and preserves them in the soul"—Mor. lib. xxxv. c. 22. St. Teresa asserts that "from a soul resolved to love God he requires nothing but obedience:" and again, that "the devil knows well that obedience is the remedy of the soul; and therefore he labours hard to prevent its attainment."

2. The venerable Father Sertorio Cupato used to say that obedience merits even the reward of martyrdom; because, as by martyrdom a Christian submits, for God's sake, to the loss of life, so by obedience he offers to the Lord the sacrifice of self-will, which is, as it were, the head of the soul." Hence, the wise man says that he who practices obedience shall conquer every enemy. "An obedient man shall speak of victory"—Prov. xxi. 28. Yes, says St. Gregory, the obedient shall overcome all the temptations of hell; because by obedience they subject their will to men, and thus become superior to the devils who fell through disobedience. "They who obey," says the Saint, "are conquerors: because, when they submit their will to others, they triumph over the angels who sinned by disobedience"—Lib. iv. in lib. reg. c. 10. Cassius observes, that since all vices proceed from self-will, when the latter is destroyed the former die in the soul. "By mortification of the will all vices wither and decay." God promises those who renounce their own will that he will raise them above the earth, and give them a celestial spirit. "If," says the Lord, "thou turn away from doing thy own will, * * * I will lift thee up above the high places of the earth, and will feed thee with the inheritance of Jacob"—Isaia. lviii. 12. St. Laurence Justinian teaches, that all who sacrifice their own will to God become so dear to him that they shall obtain whatever they ask. "He that has consecrated himself to God by the immolation of self-will, will receive all that he shall demand."

3. St. Augustine says that after Adam had by his disobedience entailed misery on himself and the whole human race, the Son of God became man, principally to teach us obedience by his own example. Jesus, from his infancy, began to obey Mary and Joseph: he continued to obey them during his life; and by his obedience was in the end brought to the ignominious death on the cross. "He humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death—even to the death of the cross"—Phil. ii. 8. St. Bernard says that "the disobedient seek to be exempted from obedience. Jesus Christ did not do so: he, indeed, gave up his life, lest he should violate obedience"—Ep. xli. The mother of God once revealed to one of her servants that our Redeemer died with a special affection for obedient souls.

4. The venerable Father de Leonardis, founder of the order of the Mother of God, being importuned by his disciples to give them a rule, wrote this single word—obedience. He wished by this act to signify what Father Sertorio Capuco used to say, that in religion obedience and sanctity are identical; that to be obedient and to be a saint are one and the same thing. St. Thomas teaches that it is principally by the vow of obedience a Christian is made a religious; and, according to St. Teresa, a religious who is not obedient cannot be called a religious. Of what use is a disobedient nun? Many are versed in the belles-lettres, in poetry, foreign languages, and in history, but are unacquainted with obedience. A religious who knows not how to obey knows nothing.

5. St. Teresa used to say, that "obedience is the short road to perfection." It is related in the lives of the fathers that one of them saw in a vision two orders of saints: the first consisted of those who had left the world and retired into the desert to practice continual prayer and penance;

the second of those who, for the love of Jesus Christ, lived in obedience and subjection to the will of others. He also saw that the latter enjoyed greater glory than the former; for although the solitaries had pleased God in all their exercises, still they had always done their own will; but they who lived under obedience had given their will to God, and thus offered to him the most acceptable of all sacrifices. St. Dorotheus relates that his disciple, St. Dositheus, being weak in health, could not practice the exercises performed by the other monks, but cast off self-will and consecrated himself entirely to obedience. He died in the space of five years. After his death, the Lord revealed to the abbot that this young man obtained the same reward as St. Paul, the first hermit, and as St. Anthony, the abbot. The monks were amazed, and could not conceive how Dositheus, who did not perform the ordinary duties of his state, could merit such exalted glory. Almighty God told them that the glory of the young saint was the reward of the obedience which he had practiced. St. Jerome says, that "a repast of precept deserves a greater reward than fasting voluntarily undertaken"—Lib. vi. in reg. c. 2. To eat through obedience is more meritorious in the sight of God than to fast through self-will. The same truth was revealed by the Blessed Virgin to St. Bridget. Being prohibited by her confessor to practice her accustomed penances, the saint began to apprehend a diminution of her fervour: but the mother of God encouraged her to obey without fear, by saying to her: "that they who do penance deserve but one reward, while he that omits, through obedience, one act of mortification, receives a two-fold renumeration; one, for the penance which he wished to perform; another, for his obedience in omitting it"—Rev. cap. 26.

6. St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say, that "an obedient religious is the precious gem of the convent." Oh! if all nuns were obedient every convent would be a paradise. Besides, a nun faithful to obedience lays up in every action an immense treasure of merit: because in every exercise she does the will of God; and in doing his will all merit consists. To enable us to acquire eternal treasures by whatsoever we do through obedience, is the principal advantage of the religious state. Even duties agreeable to our own feelings, when performed through a motive of obedience, merit a great reward. St. Lewis Gonzaga used to say, that "religion is a ship in which even he who labours not makes the voyage." Yes; for a religious merits not only when she fasts, or meditates, or recites the office, but also when, through obedience, she takes repose or abstains from labour; when she eats or indulges in recreation. Oh! how profitable and meritorious is every act performed in obedience to the will of superiors.

7. If then, blessed sister, you desire soon to become a saint, consecrate yourself entirely to obedience; divest yourself of all self-will; and endeavour, with all your might, to obey your rule and your superior in the external exercises, and your spiritual father in whatever regards the interior. It is by obedience, and by the absence of self-will, that perfect religious are distinguished from the imperfect. The latter do nothing cheerfully, but what pleases self-love and self-will. They, indeed, desire to be entrusted with some of the offices of the community, because to be without office they deem to be dishonourable. But they wish for those employments that tend to their own ease and convenience; and, in everything else, they seek their own will. In a word, they desire to become Saints, but only according to their own will, and according to the dictates of self-love. But St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say, that "he who, in serving God, seeks his own convenience, serves himself, and not God." But religious who love perfection do not act in this manner; they never omit what obedience commands, and desire only what obedience prescribes. Imitate their example, and you shall soon become a saint. Endeavour to perform all your actions from a motive of obedience, and you will always walk securely to salvation. To secure their profits, merchants obtain an insurance of their property. Let it be your care to make sure your eternal gain by procuring for every work the insurance of obedience—the approbation of your superiors: otherwise your works may prove injurious, or at least unprofitable to you. When St. Anselm was made Archbishop of Canterbury, he became unhappy in consequence of being so free from the yoke of obedience, and, at his own solicitation, the Pope appointed for the Saint a superior whom he might obey. The Saint regulated his conduct by the advice of the superior, and undertook nothing without his consent. How much more should you who, by your profession, have consecrated your will to obedience; how much more, I say, should you seek occasions of practicing that sublime virtue.

PRAYER.

Ah! my Jesus, to save me thou hast been obedient unto death—even the death of the cross: and I, for a vile and wretched gratification, have been so often disrespectful and disobedient to Thee. Wait, O Lord; do not abandon me yet. I repent with my whole soul of all the offences I have offered thee. I now see that I have abused thy mercy too much, and that therefore I am undeserving of thy pity. But I also see that thou hast borne with me till now, that, entering one day into myself, I might consecrate my whole being to thee. I hope the day has arrived when I shall dedicate myself entirely to thy love. I hear thy voice calling me to thy love. I shall no longer resist thy invitation. Behold! I offer myself to thee; refuse not O Lord, my oblation. Tell me what thou dost require of me; I am ready to do all in my power to please thee. I promise thee that henceforth I shall never violate the obedience due to my superiors. I love thee, my Jesus; and because I love thee, I desire to do all that I can to please thee. Assist me, O Lord; draw and unite me more and more every day to thy love. Eternal Father, I offer to thee the passion of thy Son, and through his merits I beseech thee to give me all the graces necessary to make me a saint, such as thou dost wish me to be. O Mary, my mother and my hope, beg of thy Son, that I may be no longer mine, but that I may belong to him entirely and for ever. Amen.

SECTION III.

On the obedience due to Superiors.

1. The principal and most efficacious means of practicing the obedience due to superiors, and of rendering it meritorious before God, is to consider that in obeying them we obey God Himself; and that by despising their commands we despise the authority of our divine Master, who has said of superiors: "He that heareth you, heareth Me; and he that despiseth you, despiseth Me"—Luke x. 16. Hence, St. Paul addressed to his disciples the following words: "Not serving to the eye, as it were pleasing men, but as servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart"—Eph. vi. 6. When, then, a religious receives a precept from her prelate, superior, or confessor, she should immediately execute it, not only to please men, but principally to please God, whose will is made known to her by their command. In obeying their directions she is more certain of doing the will of God, than if an angel came down from heaven to manifest his will to her. Hence, St. Paul says, in his epistle to the Galatians, that "though an angel from heaven preach a gospel to you besides that which the Apostles preach, he should not be believed." "No," says the Apostle, "let him be anathema"—Gal. i. 8.

2. St. Bernard says, that "God deigns to make prelates his own equals." He takes to himself the reverence or contempt manifested to them. Obedience shown to superiors is shown to God; for he has said: "He that heareth you, heareth me; and he that despiseth you, despiseth me"—Lib. 3, de dis. et præc. Bear, then, always in mind, O blessed sister, that the obedience which you practice towards your superiors is paid to God himself. Now, if Jesus Christ himself came down from heaven, and imposed any duty upon you, or gave you any particular charge, would you attempt to decline it? or would you dare to disobey his commands? "But," continues St. Bernard, "whether God, or a creature who is his representative, impose a precept, they are both to be obeyed with equal exactness"—Loco. cit. If, then, you receive a command from one who holds the place of God, you should observe it with the same diligence as if it came from God himself. St. John Climacus (Gradu. iv.) relates that in a certain monastery the superior, to set an example to the community, commanded, in their presence, an old man of eighty years to stand in the refectory for two hours without interruption. The aged monk being asked how he had been able to bear this mortification, replied: "I imagined that I stood before Jesus Christ, and that he imposed on me that humiliation; and this thought made me obey without difficulty or repugnance."

3. For our greater merit, the Lord wishes to lead us to salvation by means of faith, and therefore does not speak to us Himself, but manifests His will by the commands of our superiors. When Jesus Christ appeared to St. Paul, and transformed him into a new man, he might, in person, have directed the apostle what to do; but Jesus only said to him: "Go into the city, and there it will be told to thee what thou must do"—Acts, ix. 7. Go into the city, and Ananias will make known my will to you. Hence, blessed Egidius used to say that it is more meritorious to obey man for the love of God than to obey God himself. It may be added, that there is more certainty of doing the will of God by obedience to superiors than by obedience to Jesus Christ, should he appear in person and give his commands. Because, should Jesus Christ appear to a religious, she would not be certain whether it was he that spoke or an evil spirit, who, under the appearance of the Redeemer, wished to deceive her. But when her superiors speak, she knows for certain, from the words of Jesus Christ, that in obeying them she obeys him. "He," says our Lord, "that heareth you, heareth me." Even when it is doubtful whether the object of a precept is conformable to the law of God, the generality of theologians and masters of spiritual life teach that a religious is bound to obey, and that in obeying she is certain of not sinning, and of even pleasing God. Attend to the doctrine of St. Bernard, which he has taken from the rule of St. Benedict, "whatever a man, holding the place of God, commands, unless it be certain that it is displeasing to God, is to be received as if commanded by God himself"—Lib. 3. de dis.

4. Thus, on the day of judgment, religious will be charged with every act of disobedience: but, as St. Philip Neri used to say, they shall be most certain of not having to render an account of the actions performed through obedience. For these the superiors only who commanded them shall be held accountable. Speaklng particularly of nuns, the Lord once said to St. Catherine of Sienna: "Religious will not be obliged to render an account to me of what they do through obedience; for that I will demand an account from the superiors." "Obey," says the apostle, "your prelates, and be subject to them; for they watch, as being to render an account of your souls: that they may do this with joy and not with grief"—Heb. xiii. 17. And, O blessed spouse of the Lord, if you practice obedience, when, after death, you shall be asked by Jesus Christ, why you have not done greater penance? why you have not made more mental prayer? or why you have performed such an action? you can answer with confidence, that in all this you only fulfilled his commands by obeying your superiors, whom he commanded you to obey as you would obey himself; and that if you have done wrong, the blame is imputable to your superiors, whose authority you obeyed.

5. Attend to the words of St. Paul: "That they (your prelates) may do this with joy and not with grief"—Loco. cit. From this passage it clearly appears, that it is the duty of a religious to obey promptly, without reply, and without thwarting her superiors or disturbing their peace. Oh! how miserable is the condition of a superior whose subjects violate obedience by excuses, by coloured pretexts, by complaints, and even by murmurings. The situation of abbesses, at the approach of the time for distrbuting the offices of the community, is truly deserving of pity. They are, on the one hand, troubled by scruples arising from the apprehension that, through human respect, or through the fear of displeasing a sister, they will entrust her with a charge for which she is unfit; and on the other, they are afflicted to find that, after the distribution, one declines her office, another complains, a third murmurs, and others refuse to accept the duties assigned to them. This state of things sometimes compels the superior to dispense the offices, not according to the rules of reason and for the good of the community, but according to human prudence. In acting according to the dictates of human wisdom, to prevent greater evils, the superior may be blameless; but whoever accepts or discharges her duties not in the spirit of obedience, but through caprice, will certainly be inexcusable. The apostle commands you to obey, and to be subject to your superiors, that they may discharge their duty with joy, and not with grief. "For," says St. Paul, "this is not expedient for you"—Heb. xiii. 17. No, it is not expedient for you that the superiors be resisted and thwarted; but if they be supported and consoled in the government of the community, good order and your spiritual progress will be promoted.

6. What a scandal it is to see certain religious decline certain offices assigned to them, and thus extort obedience from their superiors. St. Bernard, in his comment on the words of the Redeemer to the blind man, "What wilt thou that I do to thee?"—(Luke xviii. 41,) says: "He was truly blind, otherwise he would have exclaimed, 'Far be it from me, O Lord, to ask thee to do what I will; tell me rather what thou wilt have me do for thee.'" Let us apply to ourselves this passage of St. Bernard. There are some nuns whom the abbess must ask what office they will undertake. Perfect religious do not require to be consulted about the office they wish for; should the superiors ask them what charge would be most agreeable to them, they answer that it is not for them to say what employment they desire, but that it belongs to her to tell them what she will have them do.

7. If, then, blessed sister, you wish to be truly obedient and truly religious, bear continually in mind that your superiors hold in your regard the place of Jesus Christ; and endeavour to show them all the veneration and love that are due to his representatives, not through a feeling of self-interest, not to be esteemed by them, or to avoid their censure, but from the sole motive of pleasing God. And this obedience is due not only to the prelate and abbess, but to all that hold office in the convent; such as the infirmarian, the sacristan, and the sister who is charged with the care of the refectory. In obeying the abbess, a religious may be easily influenced by human respect; but in obeying sisters entrusted with the inferior offices she shows that she possesses the true spirit of obedience. St. Francis of Assisium thanked God, in a particular manner, for having given him the grace to be always ready to obey the least of the novices, in all things in which they might be appointed his superiors. The saint was accustomed to say that the less the authority of a superior, and the more humble his station and qualifications, the greater is the merit of obedience, because then it proceeds from the sole motive of pleasing God.

8. Secondly, do not seek the society of imperfect sisters, who have little affection for obedience. Thirdly, receive correction with humility; beg of the superior to reprimand you as often as reproof may be necessary for you. Be not of the number of those who resent even the slightest rebuke, to whom the superior cannot give even the necessary admonitions without great caution; whose correction, lest they should be wanting in respect to her, and should disturb the community, she is, perhaps, compelled to defer for several months, till a seasonable opportunity occurs. But woe to the religious who cannot be admonished without such caution: she must be very imperfect indeed. Fourthly, when corrected receive the admonition with humility, and without excusing your fault; and should the superior charge you with a defect which you had not committed, do not speak of her mistake, unless she commands you to state your guilt or innocence. But I shall hereafter treat this subject more at large.

9. Fifthly, banish from your mind all thoughts and suspicions against the superior, with the same promptness as if they were thoughts opposed to chastity; and when you hear any one attribute to her a fault which cannot be denied, seek to excuse her as much as you can. But should the fault of the superior be evident and inexcusable—for example, were she impatient with all the sisters, persuade yourself that God permits this defect in her not for your injury but for your profit. St. Gertrude once besought the Lord to deliver the abbess from the fault of frequent impatience. In answer, she was told that he permitted this defect in the abbess as well for her own advantage as for the good of the religious; for her good, that she might be kept humble; for the good of the religious, that by bearing with her impatience their merit might be increased. "The more," says St. Bernard, "your are oppressed, the more you gain." The greater the burden you bear, the greater the merit you acquire. St. Gregory teaches that

"the commands of superiors should be respected, though their life be not deserving of praise"—In I Reg. ii. And speaking of the Scribes and Pharisees who blasphemed his works, Jesus Christ says: "All things whatsoever they shall say to you, observe and do; but according to their works do ye not"—Matt. xxiii. 3.

10. With regard to the offices of the convent, observe the excellent rule of St. Francis of Sales: never to seek and never to refuse any of them. Prefer always that which is least honourable and least suited to your convenience. Few nuns merit the full reward of obedience by fulfilling the duties of their office, because few accept and discharge them in the true spirit of obedience, and with a pure intention of pleasing God. Imperfect religious only look to the advantages and disadvantages of office; but the perfect regard only the will of God, and therefore seek not their own ease or convenience, but cheerfully embrace pains and labours. Endeavor to belong to the number of the perfect. Do not imagine that the refusal of office, through fear of committing faults in the discharge of its duties, will be excusable before God; but be persuaded that by becoming a religious you bound yourself to serve the convent. Could the fear of committing faults justify you in declining a charge, the same fear would exempt all the sisters from the obligation of accepting office. Should they give way to such fears, who would serve the monastery or support the community? Have a pure intention of pleasing God: fear not, he will assist you.

11. Accept, in the spirit of obedience, the office entrusted to you; and in accepting it regard not the power of domination; look not to self-ease nor self-esteem, but solely to the obligations of obedience. Accept it with a holy confidence, and listen not to the devil, who will perhaps suggest to you that the duties of such an office are above your strength. If you be obedient, the Lord will give you that strength which you do not possess. Do not imagine that because the duties of your charge are of a distracting nature, they will destroy in your soul the spirit of fervour and recollection. Be assured that if you comply with your duties, God will bestow upon you more graces in a quarter of an hour spent in prayer than without performing them you would receive in a retreat of ten days. In the fulfilment of your office, endeavour as much as possible to set apart some little time to recollect yourself in prayer. Do not say that your office requires every moment of your time. Perfect religious, who have an affection for prayer, can find abundant time for the discharge of their duties and for recollection. Do not imitate the conduct of some who burden themselves with such a multiplicity of occupations that they cannot find a moment's time to recollect themselves before God. In discharging the duties of office be careful not to be partial to your friends. Be still more careful not to abuse your office by employing it as a means of procuring for yourself advantages which the other sisters do not enjoy.

12. Lastly, remember that neither obedience nor even the perfection of obedience, forbids a religious to make known to her superiors all secret disqualifications for the duty imposed upon her. She may, for example, without any violation of obedience, make known to them any bodily infirmity, or whatever would render her unfit for the office assigned to her, because her superiors are not angels, but human beings, who require to be made acquainted with what of themselves they do not know. But in stating your disqualifications for any charge, you must take care, in the first place, not to speak of those which the superior already knows; for these she must be supposed to have already taken into consideration. Secondly, after explaining your difficulties, you must cheerfully acquiesce in the judgment of the superior; and your acquiescence must be manifested externally, as well for her peace and satisfaction as for the edification of the community. Hence, before they represent to the superior their unfitness for office, religious would do well to figure to themselves that, notwithstanding their supposed difficulties, she insists on the acceptance of the charge entrusted to them. By this means they will be better disposed to receive, without reply, the decision of the superior.

13. It is necessary to remark, in this place, that a discreet attention to the preservation of health, with a view to be better able to serve God, is not a defect but an act of virtue. But a superfluous solicitude about health is a fault; and, aided by self-love, makes many unnecessary indulgences appear indispensable. St. Bernard says that some are fitter to be the disciples of Hippocrates and Galenus than of Jesus Christ. "Consider," says the saint, "that you are a monk and not a physician"—Ser. 30, in Cant. And he continues: "Consult for your own repose." As if he said, seek to promote your own peace by living like the rest of the community, and by avoiding all singular and superfluous indulgence. "Spare the labour of those who serve the community." Spare the labour of the attendant in the refectory, and of the cook; and seek not after delicacies withheld from others. "Spare the burden of the house."

Abstain from putting the community to any superfluous expense. St. Basil exhorted religious to accustom themselves as much as possible to the common fare. Oh! how much better is it for a religious to eat and drink like her companions than to fast, to take discipline, or wear hair shirts, and afterwards practice singularity in her food. In singularity has originated the relaxation of many religious orders. Be not afraid that by using the common food you will be wanting in the care of your health; for although it is not lawful directly to shorten life with the intention of accelerating death, still, according to the common opinion of theologians, it is allowable to abstain from some indulgences (particularly those that are singular,) which might prolong life for some time. Such abstinence is even an act of virtue, when practiced with the intention of promoting our own spiritual advancement and the edification of our neighbour. When the celebrated chapter of Matts was held, St. Francis of Assisium saw that the demons convened a chapter, in which they agreed that to introduce a relaxation of discipline into his order, in which the spirit of fervour then flourished, the most effectual means would be to induce the religious to receive a great number of novices of noble extraction and of delicate health; because such subjects would be treated with less rigour; thus by degrees discipline would be relaxed, and the spirit of fervour banished from the order. This reasoning was most just. Beware, then, lest by immoderate care of your health you put your salvation in peril, or, at least, lose the crown of a saint. Remember that had the saints, like you, been unnecessarily solicitous about the preservation of health, they would never have become saints.

PRAYER.

O my beloved Lord, thou art beauty itself, goodness itself, and love itself; how can I love anything but thee? Fool that I have been! In my past life I have offered numberless insults to thee. I have violated thy law, but I am sorry above all things for my sins, and desire to die of grief for having offended thee. O my Jesus, have mercy upon me. I desire to cry out continually: My Jesus, mercy; O my Jesus, mercy! But if for the past I have despised thy love, I now prefer it to all the goods of the earth. Thou, O my Jesus, art, and shalt be for ever, the only object of all my affections. My love, I leave all things, and desire nothing but thee. I now say and desire to repeat every moment of my life that I desire thee alone, O my God, and nothing more. Assist me, O Lord, to be faithful to thee. Look not on my sins, but on the love thou didst bear to me when thou wast nailed to the cross for my salvation. In the merits of thy passion I place all my hopes. I love thee, O infinite Good! O my supreme Good! and ask nothing of thee but the grace to love thee; to love thee intensely, and henceforth to love no other object but thee, my treasure and my all. My Jesus, I give thee my will, purify its affections. I give thee my body, preserve it unsullied. I give thee my soul, make it belong entirely to thee. Burn with thy own consuming fire every affection which is opposed to the pure love of Thy Divinity. O Mary, my great advocate, I hope first in the merits of thy Son, and afterwards in the intercession. Amen.

SECTION IV.

On the obedience due to the rules.

St. Francis de Sales has asserted that "the predestination of religion is connected with the observance of their rules." And St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say that the observance of rule is the shortest way to eternal life and to sanctity. In a word, the only way by which a religious can become a saint and be saved is to observe her rule: for her there is no other way that leads to salvation. Hence, no matter how great her austerities, how frequent her prayers, and how numerous her other spiritual works, a religious who habitually violates any, even the most unimportant rule, will never advance a single step towards perfection. She will labour, but without fruit, verifying in herself the words of the Holy Ghost: "He that rejecteth wisdom and discipline is unhappy; and their fruit is vain, and their labours without fruit, and their works unprofitable"—Wis. iii. 11. They who despise discipline, that is their rule, are miserable, and trust in vain in their works; for their labours are without fruit. "We," says St. Teresa, "do not fulfil certain easy duties prescribed by rule, such as silence, which gives no pain; and still we go in search of works of penance, but afterwards we neglect the former and omit the latter." Not to advance in perfection is but a small part of the evils which arise from the infraction of light rules. According to St. Bernard, the worst consequence of such transgressions is, that the habit of them renders very difficult the observance of the most important rules, and even of the vows.

2. Oh! what a scandal to see certain religious, so well instructed during their noviciate in the observance of rule, and after their profession disregard regular discipline, as if their solemn consecration to Jesus Christ exempted them from all the obligations of the religious state. A learned author says: "It is better to be a finger united to the body, than to be an eye separated from it." An eye torn from the body is but rottenness; and an action which wears the appearance of virtue, but which is not conformable to rule, will never please God, but, instead of promoting, will impede the perfection of a religious. For, as St. Augustine says, acts of devotion opposed to rule are but so many steps out of the way, and so many stumbling blocks to the soul.

3. But you, O blessed sister, have left the world to become a saint; and do you not see that not to conquer yourself in small things will not only prevent you from being a saint, but will also expose you to the danger of perdition? "We had," says St. Cesarius, "abundant strength to relinquish the dearest affections, and we are not strong enough to overcome negligence"—Hom. viii. We had the courage to renounce all attachments to relatives, to property, and to the pleasures of the world; and now we are too weak to conquer our tendency to violate rule. Cassian relates (Lib. vii. Instit. c. 19,) that to a certain monk who had abandoned the dignity of senator to enter religion, but afterwards did not observe his rule, St. Basil said, in a tone of commiseration: "You have lost the rank of senator, and have not become a monk." Unhappy man, what have you done? To become a monk, you have forfeited the honourable rank of senator, and have not attained the sanctity of a religious. Tertullian says: "If you deem the liberty of the world to be true liberty, you have returned to servitude, and have lost the liberty of Christ"—De corona. nil. As if he said: O spouse of Jesus, you have gone forth from the slavery of the world, and have taken possession of the liberty of Christ by putting off all earthly affections —the unhappy chains which hold so many poor souls in bondage; and will you still esteem the liberty of the world to be true liberty? If so, you have miserably returned to the slavery of the world, and lost the freedom of the children of God, which Jesus Christ purchased for you.

4. Some religious excuse their negligence by saying that the rules which they violate are of no importance. To them I answer, in the first place, that no rule of religion can be deemed unimportant or undeserving of attention. All the rules of religion should be respected, because they are all ordained by Almighty God, and approved by the Church, as means of attaining the perfection to which every religious consecrated to God should constantly aspire; and because the neglect of even trifling rules injures regular discipline, and disturbs the whole community. It is certain that the spirit of fervour flourishes in the convent where attention is paid to the smallest rules; but where they are neglected, there piety is either lost or begins to decay. Father Sangiure relates (Erario. ec. tom. iv. c. 5, §1,) that Father Oviedo, the superior of the college of the Jesuits in Naples, insisted on the punctual observance of even the smallest rules. He was opposed by Father Bobadiglia, who asserted that it was not right to oblige subjects to observe such trifles. By this opposition the rigour of discipline was relaxed; the event showed the evil consequences of the neglect of rule. By the habitual violation of order, a contempt for the most important as well as for the smallest rules, was engendered in some who afterwards abandoned religion. Being informed of the relaxation which had taken place, St. Ignatius ordained that the rules should be observed with the utmost exactness, and thus discipline was re-established.

5. Tepid and negligent religious disregard trifles, but the devil sets great value on the smallest violation of rule: he carefully marks all our transactions, to charge us one day before the tribunal of Jesus Christ. St. Richard, a religious, having once got his hair cut before the usual time, saw the devil gathering and numbering the hairs that were scattered over the floor—Apud. Sur. 13 Sept. In like manner, St. Gertrude saw the enemy collecting all the little tufts of wool which, for want of the perfect spirit of poverty, she had allowed to be wasted; and all the syllables of the office that had been omitted in consequence of its being recited with too much tepidity. Blessed Denis, the Carthusian, relates that Satan appeared once to a religious with a needle and a silk thread in his hand, which she had used without permission. Thus, the enemy of mankind keeps a record of every word uttered in the place or time of silence, of every look of curiosity, and of every transgression of rule into which negligent religious fall. It is because they are heedless of small faults that these miserable souls experience nothing but aridity and irksomeness in their meditations, communions, and in all their exercises of devotion. In punishment of one look of curiosity, contrary to an inspiration of the Holy Ghost not to indulge her eyes, St. Gertrude was visited with spiritual dryness for eleven days. It is but just that whoever sows little should gather but little fruit. "He who soweth sparingly shall also reap sparingly"—2 Cor. ix. 6. How can the Lord be liberal of his graces and consolations to a religious who serves him with reserve and with negligence? Had she faithfully observed such a rule, God would perhaps have bestowed upon her great graces; but in punishment of her negligence, he has justly withheld them from her. Blessed Egidius used to say: "By a small neglect a great grace may be lost."

6. "Many," says St. Bonaventure, "desire to die for Christ, and are, at the same time, unwilling to bear light crosses for his sake." Many pant after the crown of martyrdom, and will violate a small rule, rather than submit to a trifling inconvenience. If, says the saint, you received a command hard to be observed, and in its fulfillment attended with serious disadvantages, there might perhaps be some apology for its violation: but for the infraction of rules of easy observance there cannot be the shadow of an excuse. The more unimportant a rule, and the more easy it is to be observed, the more imperfect the religious who transgresses it, because the greater is her attachment to self-will. But God grant that the disregard of small rules may not lead her one day to the violation of vows, and to eternal perdition. "He that breaketh a hedge," says the Holy Ghost, "a serpent shall bite him"—Eccl. x. 8. Whoever breaks down the fence of the rule stands in great danger of being one day bitten by the infernal serpent. When you see a religious of exemplary conduct fall into the pit of sin, do not imagine that the devil by the first attack succeeded in effecting her ruin. No, he first induced her to neglect her rule, and to despise small things, and then drew her into grievous transgression.

7. Others excuse themselves by saying that the rule does not bind under pain of sin. It has been already said (chap. iv. n. 5,) that to violate, without sufficient necessity, even the rules which are not obligatory under the penalty of moral guilt, is, according to the common opinion of theologians, at least a venial transgression. Speaking of the rule of his order, which has not the force of a strict precept, St. Thomas, after stating that the violation of the vows is a mortal sin, says that "the transgression of the other rules is only a venial fault"—2. 2. q. 186. 9. ad 1. I have said that to break any rule without sufficient cause is at least a venial sin. For, when the violation of rule is productive of serious injury or of great scandal in the convent, it may be a mortal sin. For example, to disturb habitually the general silence; to enter the cells of your companions; to break, without leave, the fasts prescribed by rule; and similar irregularities, sometimes rob the soul of sanctifying grace. But that the violation of rule is at least a venial sin cannot be doubted. First, because a religious, by transgressing her rule, neglects the means of attaining the perfection to which she is bound to aspire. Secondly, because she is unfaithful to the promise which, at her profession, she made to observe the rules of the community. Thirdly, because by her bad example in transgressing rule she disturbs the good order of the community. Fourthly. and lastly (and this the strongest reason,) because every infraction of rule proceeds from self-love, and is a departure from the will of God. Unnecessary transgressions of rule are certainly not acts of virtue: neither can they be said to be indifferent. For how can we call an action indifferent, which is performed through self-will, which gives bad example and destroys the order of regular discipline? If, then, the violation of a rule cannot be good or indifferent, it must be sinful. Some perhaps will say—it is enough for me that the violation of rule is not a mortal sin. To such persons I would answer, that they are in a very dangerous state. If they are not dead, they are in the last agony. Their unhappy souls are infected with a slow fever, which will soon bring on death. Let them read number 3 of the 6th chapter.

8. In extenuation of their neglect of rule, others say that they are advanced in years, and that they cannot bear the rigours practiced by young persons. In answer to them I say, that a religious, whether young or old, does injury to herself and the community by the transgression of rule. St. Peter Chrysologus says, that "by its shade a barren tree is pernicious, not only to itself but also to the fertile plants by which it is surrounded"—Serm. 106. Yes, every religious who gives bad example by inattention to rule, does an injury to her own soul and to her fervent companions. Besides, religious advanced in years are more strictly bound to perfect observance than those who are young in religion. First, because they have been longer in the cloister: and as the more time a person has devoted to study the more extensive should be his learning; so, the longer a religious is engaged in the meditation of Jesus crucified, the greater should be her progress in the science of the saints and in Christian perfection. Secondly, because the example of the more advanced is most efficacious in inducing the juniors to observe or to violate rule. Religious of long standing are the torches which enlighten the community: they are the pillars that sustain regular observance; and by their example they engage the young in the support of the order. But if discipline be disregarded by the oldest members of the community, the rule will be despised by the novices in religion. Generally speaking, all the irregularities that creep into convents are to be ascribed not so much to the young as to the advanced religious, who, by their bad example, lead the others to seek a relaxation of the rigour of the rule. As long as their works contradict their words all their exhortations and entreaties to the juniors to observe rule will be unprofitable. "The eyes," says St. Ambrose, "persuade sooner than the ears"—Ser. 76. Example is far more persuasive than admonition.

9. And how is it possible to induce novices to observe rule when the conduct of superiors is subversive of regular observance? "Nothing," says Tertullian, "can be built up by the same means as that by which it is pulled down" —Præsc. When Eleazar was tempted by the wicked Antiochus to transgress the divine command, which forbid the Hebrews to eat swine's flesh his friends, through compassion for his old age, besought him, in order to escape death, at least to pretend to comply with the tyrant's order. But the venerable old man wisely replied, "that he would rather be sent into the other world: for it doth not become our age to dissemble"—2*Mac.* vi. 23. He would rather sacrifice his life than pretend, at such an advanced age, to break the divine precept, and thus teach his young countrymen to transgress the law. "The look of a just man," says St. Ambrose, "is an admonition"—Ser. 10, in Ps. cxviii. Oh! what an affecting admonition to novices, and how far superior to the most eloquent exhortation, to see an aged religious observing with punctuality all the rules, great and small! All the zeal and exertions of religious who love perfection should be directed to the support of discipline in all its rigour. When Jesus Christ, by stretching forth his right hand, showed St. Teresa that he was espoused to her, he said: "Henceforth, as my true spouse, you shall be zealous for my honour." Every spouse, then, of Jesus should ardently seek his glory. But it is for the observance of the rules, which are the principal support of perfection in the community, that religious should display all their zeal. And this zeal should be cherished not only by superiors but by all, and especially by those whose office or age gives them authority over the other sisters. Whenever St. Andrew Avellini saw the rules transgressed, he admonished with great fervour not only his companions in religion, but also his superiors. It is related in the life of Father Torres (Lib. vi. c. 1, sec. 7), that one of his penitents, sister M. Teresa Spinelli, a religious of great zeal and piety in the convent of the Most Holy Trinity at Naples, seeing certain abuses introduced into the community, opposed them vehemently, without regard to any person, however great his dignity. She had in view only God's honour; and to uphold it by resisting the introduction of irregularity into religion she endured many troubles and contradictions. When manifest abuses and relaxation of discipline steal into a convent, it is not pride or temerity, but an act of virtue and zeal, to exclaim against them, and even to oppose the superiors themselves, should such opposition be necessary for the correction of abuses.

10. Through a pretended fear of being troublesome to the superior, some abstain from asking permission to do what they are forbidden by rule to do without her leave. This, too, is a vain excuse; for superiors, instead of being annoyed, are edified by the religious who ask permission as often as they may be required. Besides, how can a superior complain of the sisters for asking any permission which your rule commands you to ask? And when, to support the observance of rule, your superior refuses your request, be not disturbed, but thank her for the refusal, and keep your soul in peace. All the passengers in a ship rejoice, and even feel grateful to the pilot, when they see that he compels all the sailors, without exception, to attend to their duty; for should even one of them neglect his post, the vessel might be lost. The rules are burdensome; but they are only the burden of the wings with which we fly to the Lord. "The burden of Christ," says St. Augustine, "has wings"—In Ps. lix. Yes, it has wings which assist us to rise on high. The rules are fetters: but they are bonds of love which unite us to the Supreme Good. When bound by rule, we should say with holy David: "The lines are fallen into me in goodly places"—Ps. xv. 6. To me these cords are not a badge of dishonour but of nobility; they are the objects of my love, because they deliver me from the chains of hell. And when we feel pain or sorrow in consequence of being deprived by our rule of any gratification which self-love prompts us to desire, let us rejoice and say with the Apostle: "I, a prisioner in the Lord"—Eph. iv. 1. As if he said: "I see that I am a prisoner, but I exult in those chains which bind me to my God, and merit for me an eternal crown." "He would not," says St. Augustine, "put a golden necklace on you, if he had not first chained you in iron fetters"—In Ps. cxlix. The Lord would not give you the golden necklace of eternal glory without having first bound you with the chains of rule.

11. Should a sister then ask you to do what without permission you are forbidden to do, tell her, without hesitation, that you cannot accede to her request. You ought not be ashamed to refuse when there is a question of avoiding a fault, and especially the violation of rule. No; should the others be negligent, it is your duty to be singular in regular observance. Be not afraid that your regularity will be an occasion of vain glory. That your example may shine forth, and serve as an incentive to others to observe rule, and thus give glory to God, it is certainly his will that, if the rest of the community be careless, you should be singular in attending even to the smallest rules. "So let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven"—Matt. v. 16. If you are not able to do great things for God, to perform rigorous penances, or to devote much time to prayer, strive at least to observe your rule with exactness; and be assured that by its sole observance you will, in a short time, make rapid progress in perfection. A great servant of God used to say, that "the punctual observance of rule is the short way to sanctity." "The best perfection," says St. Bonaventure, "is to fulfil all things whatsoever that are prescribed"—Spec. par. ii. c. 2. God will be liberal to a religious in proportion to her fidelity to him. "A religious," says St. Teresa, "faithful to the minutest of the rules, does not walk, but flies to perfection, without either wings or feathers."

12. St. Augustine justly calls the rule the mirror of religious: for by its observance the character of a religious may be known. "Yes," says Hugo of Victor, commenting on St. Augustine, "the rule is the best test by which we may discover whether religious are just or unjust; whether they advance; whether they are pleasing or displeasing God." By seeing religious attentive to rule, or careless about its observance, we ascertain at once whether they love or do not love perfection; whether they go forward or recede; whether they please or displease God. Be assured that a religious will become a saint, not by doing a multiplicity of works, but by the faithful observance, of rule. At the times set apart by the rule for labour or for recreation, a religious should not go to prayer, to the choir, nor take the discipline. "These unseasonable devotions are," says Father Alvarez, "sacrifices of rapine which God does not accept." A certain Capuchin was accustomed to absent himself from the common labours for the purpose of attending to his private devotions. On the bed of sickness Jesus Christ, in quality of his judge, appeared to him, and ordered all his vocal prayers, and other devotions performed during the time of the common exercises, to be taken from him, and to be distributed among those who had laboured for the community. By the mercy of God his life was prolonged; his health was restored: and ever after the good brother assisted most punctually at all the common duties. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that the best means to acquire great merit is to be present at every assembly of the community. It is true that in certain circumstances, as when you labour under infirmity, or are engaged in some very important duty of office, it is not a fault to break some small rule. But it is likewise true, that transgressions committed under pretence of sickness or necessity, frequently proceed from sloth and from a want of affection for the rule. For others, who are prehaps more infirm, and not less occupied in the offices of the convent, never violate the rules which you so often transgress. They who love discipline find the means of observing the rule, and also of discharging the duties of office. St. Teresa used to say, that "sometimes the evil is small, and therefore we imagine that we are not bound to avoid it."

13. To read your rule frequently, for the purpose of seeing what faults you commit, and what you have to correct, will contribute greatly to infuse into your soul an affection for exact observance. The reading of the rules is one of the best spiritual lectures you can make. It will also be very profitable to make your particular examen on the rules which you transgress most frequently. Whenever you violate rule, be not ashamed to acknowledge your fault to the superior, and to ask penance for it. The devil once said to St. Dominick, that in the chapter at which religious confess their defects, and receive penance and admonition for them, he lost all that he gained in the refectory, in the parlour, and in the other places of the monastery. Before you confess your fault, dispose your heart to accept whatever reproof or penance may be given to you, lest you should be like the religious who, to show that they are humble and exact in the observance of rule, acknowledge their defects, but are at the same time unwilling to be reproved for their transgressions. "But to be profitable, the observance of rule," as St. Ignatius has remarked, "must, above all, be accompanied with the spirit of love, and not the perturbation of fear"—Const. par. vi. 1. You should observe the rules, not to escape the rebukes of the superior, nor to win the admiration of her sisters, but through the spirit of love, and to please Jesus Christ. Hence the same saint has declared that in not annexing the penalty of sin to the violation of the rule of the Society of Jesus, his object was "to make love take the place of the fear of offending God."

"Count," says St. Eucharius, "among the days of your life that day only on which you have denied self-will, and which you have spent without any violation of rule"—Hom. ix. ad Monac. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi has recommended three very efficacious means of observing rule: "First, to prize the rule as you esteem God himself. Secondly, to act as if you alone were obliged to observe rule. Thirdly, if the others fail in regular observance, to endeavour to supply their deficiency."

14. In a word (I say again,) you must be persuaded that the perfection of a religious does not consist in great and manifold works, but in performing all her actions well. Great, indeed, was the praise of the multitude to Jesus Christ, when they said: "He hath done all things well"—Mark, vii. 37. To achieve what is difficult and extraordinary is not given to all: nor can extraordinary works be performed at all times. But ordinary actions—such as the common prayer; the examen of conscience; communion; the hearing of mass; the recitation of the divine office; the fulfilment of the duties annexed to the offices of the community; and the other obligations imposed by rule, are duties which may be discharged every day, and by all the members of the convent. Be assured that though in the fulfilment of ordinary duties you should be employed in the meanest occupations, the faithful discharge of them will certainly make you a saint. It is not enough to do what God wills; it is moreover necessary to do it in the manner he wishes. It is related in the Chronicles of the Cistercians that St. Bernard saw many angels noting what the monks were doing in the choir. The works of one were witten in gold; of another in silver; of a third in ink; and of a fourth in water; to denote the perfection or imperfection with which each attended at prayer. Consider, then, how easily, if you will, you can arrive at perfection: by the discharge of your ordinary duties you may become a saint. The Lord does not require of you lofty flights of contemplation, nor formidable penances; all he demands is that you perform all your actions well.

15. Many religious, on days of devotion—for example, during the novenas of the Nativity, of the Holy Ghost, and of the Blessed Virgin—practice many exercises of piety, fasts, disciplines, vocal prayers, and similar works of penance. All these are very good; but the best devotion for a religious on such occasions is to perform her ordinary duties with extraordinary perfection. The perfection of an action consists first in its being done through the sole motive of pleasing God: for it is not the external act but purity of intention that constitutes perfection. "All the glory of the king's daughter is within"—Ps. xliv. 14. The perfection of an action consists, secondly, in doing it well; that is, with promptness, attention, and exactness. To perform our actions well, the first means is to preserve during the discharge of our duties a lively sense of the presence of God, that thus every act may be worthy of his divine eyes. The second means is to perform every work as if it were the only duty you had to fulfil. When at prayer, let your sole care be to pray well: when you say the divine office direct all your attention to the devout recitation of it: when engaged in any employment enjoined by obedience, your sole concern should be to discharge it well. Think of nothing but the duty in which you are occupied. To examine during the time of prayer how you will execute a certain work, or to reflect on the means of performing any other duty, is a temptation of the enemy. "When," says Father M. Avilla, "any unseasonable thought enters your mind say, God does not will that I think at this moment on such a subject, and therefore it is not useful for me to reflect upon it: when he commands me I shall attend to it." The third means is to perform every action as if it were the last of your life. St. Anthony frequently recommends this means to his disciples. "In every work," says St. Bernard, "let each one say to himself; if I were about to die would I do this?"—In Spec. Mon. Would I do it in this manner? Were this the last Mass which I should hear, with what devotion would I assist at it! Were this the last office which I should recite, with what attention would I say it! Were this my last communion or my last meditation, with what fervour would I perform it! "When," says St. Basil, "you discharge the duties of the morning, imagine that you shall not live till evening: when night approaches think that you shall not see morning." It is related of a certain Dominican, who was accustomed to go to confession every morning before he offered the holy sacrifice of the Mass, that being seized with a serious malady, his superior commanded him to prepare for death by a good confession. The good religious raised his hands to heaven and exclaimed: "Blessed be God, I have confessed every day for the last thirty years, as if I were to die suddenly." "Blessed," says the Redeemer, "is that servant, whom, when his Lord shall come he shall find so doing"—Matt. xxiv. 46. And happy the religious whom, should death come suddenly upon her, Jesus Christ, her judge, shall find performing the duty in which she may be engaged, as if she knew it to be the last of her life.

16. To think each day only on the labours of the day is another means which greatly assists weak souls to discharge their duties with fervour. The apprehension of the pains to be endured, in living till death with so much exactness, and in continually resisting self-love, is one of the causes which make many lose courage in the way of God. The best means of conquering this temptation is to imagine each morning that you have but one day to live. Whoever figures to himself that only one day of life remains will certainly perform all the actions of that day with great perfection. This means is very profitable to weak souls; but strong and perfect Christians do not require to conceal from themselves the labours necessary for the attainment of sanctity; they rejoice in suffering, and pant for opportunities of pleasing God. To religious beginning to walk in the way of perfection, it will be very useful to consider that what is in itself difficult and painful will, by habit, soon become easy and agreeable. "I will," says the Holy Ghost, "lead thee of the paths of equity, which, when thou shalt have entered, thy steps shall not be straitened, and when thou runnest thou shalt not meet a stumbling block" —Prov. iv. 11, 12. I will, says the Lord, first conduct you into the narrow paths of virtue; but you shall soon walk through a broad and pleasing way, and there you shall run without difficulties or obstacles. "At first," says St. Bernard, writing to Pope Eugenius, "some duty will seem intolerable; if you accustom yourself to it, in process of time it will not appear so difficult, afterwards you shall not feel it, and in the end will delight in it"—Lib. i. de cons. "Behold with your eyes," says Ecclesiasticus, "how I have laboured a little, and have found much rest to myself"—chap. li. v. 35.

PRAYER.

O my God, I am that unhappy soul that has long since merited the curse of the barren fig-tree. Since I have produced no fruit, why should I occupy a place in religion? I have deserved to be cut down and cast into the fire. Unhappy me! I have been for so many years in religion, and favoured with so many helps to sanctity, and what fruit have I brought forth? But thou dost not wish that I despair or diffide in thy mercy. You have said: "Ask and you shall receive." Since thou dost desire me to demand thy graces, the first favour I seek is the pardon of all the displeasure I have given to thee. I have repaid thy love and thy benefits by so many insults; but I repent, my God, with my whole soul. The second grace I ask of thee is the gift of thy love, that henceforth I may love thee, not with tepidity, as in my past life, but with my whole soul, and that I may never more give thee the least displeasure, but that I may always do whatever I know to be pleasing to thee. The third grace I ask is holy perseverance in thy love. I now esteem thy love more than all the kingdoms of the earth. Thou wishest me to be entirely thine, and I desire to belong to thee without reserve. On the cross and in the blessed sacrament thou hast given thyself entirely to me; I offer my whole being to thee. I thank thee for enabling me by thy grace to make this oblation. Since thou hast inspired, I hope thou hast accepted it. O my Jesus, I am thine, and I trust that thou wilt be mine for all eternity. I desire not that my inclinations, but thy holy will, may live henceforth in me. And I promise from this day forward to observe all even the smallest of the rules of religion, because I know that all of them are approved by thee. O my love, my love! I will say with St. Catherine of Genoa, no more sins. I beseech thee to make me always love thee, or to take me out of life. Either love or death, O my God. Mary, my mother, speak to thy Son, and obtain for me the grace to love him or to die. Amen.

SECTION V.

On the four degrees of perfect obedience.

1. To be perfect in obedience, a religious must obey with promptness, exactness, cheerfulness, and simplicity. These are the degrees of perfect obedience. The first degree, then, is to obey with promptness, executing immediately and without reply every injunction imposed by obedience. There are some who obey only after many entreaties of the superior, and after many attempts to elude her commands. Religious who are truly obedient do not act in this manner. "A Christian, faithful to obedience," says St. Bernard, "knows not delays, but prepares his ears for hearing, and his hands and his feet for labour"—Serm. de Obed. A religious truly obedient is never slow to obey, but instantly applies her ears to hear every precept, and her hands and feet to execute every command. She does not indulge in slothful slumbers after the morning bell, but obeying its sound as the call of God himself, she instantly rises. On receiving a precept, she makes no reply, offers no excuses, manifests no repugnance, as some do, by a silence which often afflicts the superior, but instantly, and with external joy, shows her readiness to obey, and immediately fulfils the commands. She is not like those who are with difficulty made to submit to authority, and who, by their reluctance to obey, lose the greater part of the merit of obedience. No; to ensure her compliance with every duty, neither entreaties, nor arguments, nor repeated commands are necessary. She fulfils at once, and without reply, every obligation of obedience.

2. Oh! how meritorious in the sight of God is prompt obedience. He has several times shown, even by supernatural prodigies, how acceptable it is in his sight. St. Mark, a monk, while engaged in writing, was called by his superior, the Abbot Silvan; the saint left unfinished a word which he had just commenced, and instantly obeyed. On his return he found the remainder of the word written in letters of gold—Vita. Patr. de obed. sec. 1. Blosius relates that a nun to whom the infant Jesus appeared, being summoned at the moment of his appearance to a certain duty, instantly obeyed the call. At her return she found him grown up to the age of manhood, and was addressed by him in the following words, "My child, your ready obedience has made me grow thus in your heart." Jesus appeared to another religious, who on hearing the bell for vespers left him, and went to the choir. When she returned to her cell he appeared to her again, and said: "Because you left me, you have found me again; had you not obeyed the call of duty I should have departed from you"—Chron. S. Franc. cap. 33. To try the obedience of some of his monks who were confined to bed by sickness, St. Columban commanded them to rise and go to the barn to thresh corn. As many as were filled with the true spirit of obedience instantly arose, and were suddenly restored to health. The others, because they were weak in spirit as well as in body, remained in bed, and continued in their infirmities—P. Plat. de bono. Stat. rel. lib. 2. c. 5. God has also sometimes shown how much he dislikes tardy obedience. Blessed Juniper, while employed in planting a tree in the garden, was called by St. Francis. The brother did not obey the call immediately, but waited till he had finished the work in which he was engaged. The saint, to show him the fault he had committed by the tardiness of his obedience, cursed the tree, and, on the part of God, commanded it to grow no larger. The tree obeyed, and never increased in size—Wadding, Annal. Min. an. 1222, n. 11. The narrator of this fact states that when he wrote his annals the tree was preserved in the convent of the city of Carniola: that it remained green, but was as small as when it was planted. How scandalous is it to see certain religious slow to obey! Were the duty of obedience not of precept, they should perhaps discharge it without delay, because it would be agreeable to self-will. Some will obey only after having frequently said to the superior: "I cannot perform this duty." They would speak with more truth, if they said: "I do not wish to do what you command." S. Joseph Calasanctius used to say, that he who instead of saying, "I will not," says "I cannot," deceives himself and not his superior.

3. The second degree of obedience is to obey with exactness; that is, with punctuality and without interpretation. You should obey with punctuality, not rob God of any part of your sacrifice by a mutilation of the victim you offer to him. You should carefully fulfil the whole duty imposed upon you, and employ in its discharge all the time prescribed by obedience. Some are punctual in the presence of the superior, but in her absence they comply so imperfectly with the obligations of obedience that it would be difficult to determine whether the fulfilment of their duties is a source of merit or demerit. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that "religious have consecrated their will not to men but to God; that they have given it to him, not in part, but entirely and without reserve." It is also necessary to obey without interpreting in your own favour the commands which you receive. A lay brother from another convent, came one day to the house of the Dominicans in Bologna. Being obliged to go out in haste, on pressing and important business, he obtained permission from the superior to take for his companion the brother he should first meet. Meeting by chance St. Thomas, he asked the Saint, in the name of the superior, to accompany him. The saint instantly obeyed, but being corpulent walked slowly; the lay brother, because his business was urgent, entreated the Saint to quicken his pace. When the brother knew who his companion was, he frequently begged pardon of St. Thomas for having treated him so disrespectfully; but the holy doctor bore all without the least sign of impatience—Ap. Sur. 7, Mart. St. Thomas might have interpreted the command of the prior, and have reasonably inferred that it did not extend to him; but no, he wished to obey without reply and without interpretation, and when he was told that he might have excused himself, he answered that the sole concern of a religious should be to fulfil with exactness the obligations of obedience.

4. Cassian relates (Inst. lib. 5, cap. 40,) that two young religious, being sent by the Abbot John with a basket of figs as a present to an aged monk who lived at a distance, missed their way, and wandered through a desert for many days without food. In such necessity they might, without violating obedience, have interpreted in their own favour the command of their superior, and have eaten of the figs sent to the monk; but rather than depart from even the letter of the precept, they submitted to a painful death. They were afterwards found dead, and the figs untouched. I do not mean to say that it is never lawful to transgress the letter of a precept; or that it is wrong to interpret the will of superiors, when circumstances justify or render necessary an interpretation of their command. But I assert that certain forced and sophistical interpretations differ but little from formal acts of disobedience. Subjects should always comply with even the letter of a precept, unless they be certain that the superior does not intend to oblige them to fulfil it. Some religious, though fully acquainted with the will of the superior, follow the dictates of their own caprice, saying that what they do is not forbidden. But Albert Magnus says that "a truly obedient man never waits for a command, but performs, as if commanded, whatever he knows or judges to be the will of his superior"—De Virtut. cap. 2. It is in the prompt fulfilment of the will of the superior that perfect obedience consists. St. Thomas teaches that the will of the superior, in whatever way it is known, should be regarded as a tacit precept by the religious who aspires to perfect obedience—1. q. 164, a. 2.

4. The third degree of obedience is to obey with joy. To obey with reluctance, and murmuring against superiors, is a defect rather than an act of virtue. "If," says St. Bernard, "murmuring in your heart, you begin to judge the superior, though you externally comply with the precept, your compliance is not a virtue, but a covering of malice" —Serm. 3, de circum. If you murmur interiorly against the superior, the fulfilment of her commands is but a cloak thrown over your malice. For your obedience is only external, and in your heart you disregard her authority, and violate the divine law. Oh! what a misery to see certain religious who discharge with cheerfulness only the duties which they themselves have asked, or which they have been requested and entreated to perform, and who accept without reluctance only the offices by which their own self-love is gratified.

6. How can a person who importunes the superior for a charge agreeable to her inclinations, who is willing to accept such a charge and no other, how, I say, can she be called an obedient religious? St. Ignatius used to say, "that to regard as an act of obedience the fulfilment of a command extorted from a superior is an illusion;" and in confirmation of his assertion he adduced the following words of St. Bernard: "Whosoever, either openly or secretly, labours to obtain from his spiritual father a precept agreeable to self-will deceives and vainly flatters himself by imagining that he practices obedience; for in this he does not obey his superior, but the superior rather obeys him." Tritemius goes so far as to call the religious who obeys with reluctance a "monster of the devil;" for he, too, obeys, but his obedience is forced. A religious who obeys only by constraint is, in a certain sense, worse than the demons; because she has promised obedience to God by her solemn vow, but they have not. In what, I ask, does the obedience of such a religious consist? Is it not in doing with cheerfulness what pleases her own caprice and in performing what is painful to self-love with reluctance, and with external signs of discontent? "What room is there for obedience," says St. Bernard, "where the bitterness of sadness is perceived?"—De vit. obed.

7. "God loveth a cheerful giver"—2 Cor. ix. 7. The Lord loves the man who performs with cheerfulness whatever he does for the love of God. Religious filled with the true spirit of obedience execute with the greatest joy the commands that are most opposed to their inclinations; because it is in the fulfilment of such commands that they are most certain of not doing their own will, and of doing the will of God. And what can give greater happiness to a Christian than, in the performance of every duty, to be able to say: By this action I please God? If you, O blessed sister, desire to give great pleasure to Jesus Christ, beg of the superior to impose upon you whatever precepts she pleases, without any regard to your inclinations; for thus she will be more free in prescribing to you the necessary duties, and you shall have greater merit in executing her orders. You shall then be certain of deserving as great a reward by works agreeable to self-love as by the exercises opposed to the feelings of flesh and blood. Never depart from the excellent rule of St. Francis de Sales—neither to ask nor to refuse any duty.

8. "Obedience," says St. John Climacus, "is the sepulchre of self-will"—Grad. 4. Some call obedience, "the death" of self-will; but it is more properly denominated "its sepulchre." For the dead, as long as they are unburied, may be seen; but after their interment they are no longer visible. Some destroy self-will by the practice of obedience, but still allow it to appear in their interior. In the perfect, self-will is not only dead but buried, so that in their actions it can never be perceived. In St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi self-will was so completely extinguished that her superiors could never know what was agreeable or disagreeable to her. Endeavour to imitate her conduct, and to receive with perfect indifference all the duties, offices, and employments that may be assigned to you, and to fulfil them with cheerfulness and alacrity. If you desire to discharge your obligations with true joy, you must perform them from the pure intention of pleasing God. If you comply with them to obtain the friendship of the superior, to induce her to grant your requests, to escape her displeasure or the charge of disobedience, or through any other motive of self-interest, you may indeed satisfy the superior, but you will not please God, and therefore you shall suffer all the fatigue and pains of obedience, without enjoying the tranquillity of an obedient religious. Moreover, if to please God be the sole end of your obedience, you will cheerfully obey, not only when the tone and manner of the superior are sweet and agreeable, but also when her directions are given in severe and commanding language: in this merit consists. Father Rodriguez relates that St. Gertrude besought the Lord to deliver the abbess from her roughness of manner and impatience towards the sisters; but in answer, Almighty God told her that he permitted these defects in the abbess to keep her humble, and for the greater trial and merit of the religious.

9. The fourth and last degree of perfect obedience is to obey with simplicity. "Servants," says the Apostle, "be obedient * * * * in the simplicity of your hearts"—Eph. vi. 5. To be simple of heart you must subject your own judgment to that of the superior, and esteem as just and reasonable whatever she commands. Behold how the Holy Ghost teaches his spouse the duty of perfect obedience. "If thou knowest not thyself, O fairest among women, go forth, and follow after the steps of thy flocks"—Cant. i. 7. O fairest of women, if you know not how to make yourself the object of my love, come and I will teach you: go forth from thyself, and follow after the steps of thy flocks, which, when sent to pasture, ask not where or when or why they go. They obey their pastor without reply: so should a religious obey without demanding the reasons for her obedience. That great servant of God, Father Pavone, of the Society of Jesus, used to say that obedience, to be perfect, should captivate the intellect as well as the will. The obedience of a religious whose will only obeys, and whose understanding condemns what the superior commands, is lame and imperfect. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi says, that "perfect obedience requires a soul without a will, and a will without intellect." Hence, to acquire the perfect spirit of obedience, the Saint was accustomed first to captivate her judgment, and then to perform the duty imposed on her. He who does not practice obedience of the intellect will hardly obey with cheerfulness; his submission will be that of a slave—the result of force not the obedience of a child and the fruit of love. Hence the Apostle says: "With a good will serving, as to the Lord, and not to men"—Eph. vi. 7. Obey with a good will, serving God rather than men. Your obedience shall never be cheerful, unless it proceeds from a motive of pleasing God, who can never err in his precepts, and who commands only what will be profitable to us.

10. St. Thomas (1. 2. qu. 83. a. 5. ad. 3) teaches that, though the commands of a superior may appear impossible, a religious should make an effort to fulfil them. Because subjects have no right to decide on the possibility or impossibility of a precept imposed upon them. "Perfect obedience," says St. Bernard, "is indiscreet"—De Vit. Sol. In subjects perfect obedience does not require discretion. And in another place the Saint says: "It is impossible for a prudent novice to persevere in religion." A novice who regulates her obedience by her own prudence cannot persevere in the religious state. "Because," continues the Saint, "to assume the office of superior is, in a novice, insufferable pride." "To decide belongs to the superiors; and to obey is the duty of the subject." To decide what is to be done is the prerogative of the superior; and to fulfil her commands the bounden duty of subjects. St. Ignatius once said, that should the Pope command him to undertake a voyage by sea in a ship without a mast, without oars, or sails, he would blindly obey the precept. And when he was told that it would be imprudent to expose his life to danger, he answered, that "prudence is necessary in superiors; but in subjects the perfection of prudence is to obey without prudence."

11. This doctrine is conformable to sacred Scripture: "Behold," says the Lord, "as clay is in the potter's hands, so are you in my hands, O house of Israel!"—Jer. xviii. 6. Religious must leave themselves in the hands of the superior to be moulded as she wills. "Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it: What art thou making?"—Is. xlv. 9. If clay should dare to say to the potter, why hast thou formed me thus?—the potter ought to answer: be silent, it is not your business to inquire what I do, but to obey and to receive whatever form I please to give you. Such the answer merited by religious who seek to know why a precept, an office, or a duty, is imposed upon them. St. Jerome, in an epistle to Rusticus, a monk, says: "It is your duty to obey: judge not of the decision of your superior." In the lives of the monks of La Trappe we read that a good religious, called Arsenius, judged to be superfluous the expense incurred by the superior in making the church more commodious. But afterwards reflecting that his judgment was in opposition to that of his superior, he went immediately and with tears accused himself of his fault, as if it were a great crime. The abbot told him that his fault was not so grievous as he imagined: but Arsenius could not restrain the torrent of tears which flowed from his eyes—Prod. gratiæ, t. 2, p. 24.

12. To regard as good whatever superiors command is the blind obedience so much praised by the saints, and is the duty of every religious. First, because, according to the proverb, no one is fit to be judge in his own cause. When there is question of their own interest, self-love renders it difficult for all men to distinguish truth from falsehood: and, therefore, no one should be the judge of what regards himself. Secondly, because a superior is acquainted with a great many circumstances of which subjects are ignorant: and therefore her opinion should be preferred to theirs. Thirdly, because subjects only regard their own interests; but the superior looks to the good of the community. Fourthly, because superiors are assisted, in a particular manner, by Almighty God, to govern the community: and therefore are favoured with lights not given to subjects.

13. Of St. Paul it is written, that after his conversion, "when his eyes were opened, he saw nothing. But they leading him by the hand brought him to Damascus"—Acts ix. 8. Some religious are unwilling to obey without examining whether the duty imposed upon them will be profitable or unprofitable to them. Should it appear not suited to them, they either refuse to obey or obey only with reluctance, and sometimes go so far as to charge the superintendant with imprudence, indiscretion, or partiality. All this arises from a want of the spirit of blind obedience, and from a desire to demand from the superior the reason why she imposed certain duties. "To seek for reason is," according to St. Bernard, "a sign of an imperfect heart"—De discip. ad præc. Whoever demands the reason of a precept shows a very imperfect will. It was by asking the reasons of the divine command that the devil tempted Eve to eat the forbidden apple, and succeeded in making her prevaricate. "Why," said the serpent, "hath God commanded you that you should not eat of every tree in paradise?"—Gen. iii. 1. Had Eve answered: it belongs not to us to seek the reason of the precept—it is our duty to obey—she should not have fallen. But because she began to examine the reason of the command, she replied: we can eat of the fruits of paradise. There is but one tree which we are forbidden to touch, "lest perhaps we die." Perceiving that she began to doubt the threatened punishment of death, he rejoined, be not afraid, "you shall not die;" and thus he persuaded her to transgress the command of God.

14. Religious who are truly obedient seek not for reasons; but like St. Paul, with open eyes they see not, and reduce a haughty intellect to the subjection of obedience by submitting their judgment to that of their superior. St. John Climachus says that a religious should banish thoughts opposed to obedience as she would reject thoughts against chastity, that is, immediately and without reply; and that, instead of questioning the reasonableness of the precepts of her superior, she should always seek for reasons to defend their expediency. Almighty God has several times shown in a miraculous manner, how much he delights in the blind obedience of religious. Sulpitius Severus relates (Dial. de Vita S. Mart. cap. 12,) that to try the obedience of a young man who applied for admission into a certain monastery, the abbot commanded him to walk into a furnace filled with burning coals. The young man instantly plunged into the fire, but received no injury; his clothes were not even touched. St. Gregory relates, (Dial. lib. iii. c. 7,) that St. Benedict commanded St. Maur to follow the young St. Placidus who had fallen into a river. St. Maur obeyed, walked on the waters, and saved the life of the boy. These examples are not to be imitated. The precepts given by these holy men, and their fulfilment, proceeded from extraordinary impulses of the Holy Ghost, who assured the superiors, that, by their commands, and the subjects, that, by their obedience, they were accomplishing the divine will. But, at the same time, they show how much God is pleased by blind, unhesitating obedience. To try the obedience of their subjects superiors sometimes impose commands that are inexpedient, and even absurd. St. Francis commanded his disciples to plant cabbages with their roots uppermost. He obliged brother Matthew to continue turning round till he fell to the ground. St. Teresa made similar trials of her children. But you will ask of what use are such precepts. In answer, I ask why are untrained horses made sometimes to run, sometimes to stop, and sometimes to go back? All these contribute to make them obedient to the bridle: and to exercise religious in what appears extravagant and useless, accustoms them to subdue the stubbornness of their own will, and to subject their own judgments to that of their superior.

15. St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say, that "to follow one's own judgment in the practice of obedience is not obedience." In every act of your life be careful, O blessed sister, never to prefer your own opinion to that of your superiors. St. Philip Neri has remarked that nothing is more dangerous than to be directed by one's own counsel. Peter Blessensis says, that "to trust one's self alone is the greatest of evils." Cassian asserts that "it is impossible for him who confides in his own judgment to escape the deceits and illusions of the devil"—Coll. xvi. c. 11. Hence, St. John Chrysostom teaches that "nothing is so destructive of the Church as a separation of the disciples from their masters"—Hom. in dict. S. Paul. There is nothing which does greater injury to the Church of God than the opposition of disciples to the opinion of their masters; and there is nothing more ruinous to a religious community thar the disregard of the sisters for the judgment of their superiors.

PRAYER.

O my Jesus, thou dost never abandon a soul that seeks thee. "Thou hast not forsaken them that love thee"—Dan. xiv. 37. I have left the world to find thee in this holy place: but I have only sought myself and my own pleasures, and thus I have greatly offended thee. Forget, O Lord, the past, and pardon the offences which I have committed against thee, and which I now abhor with my whole soul. I feel a strong desire to become a saint, and to please thee in all things. I know that this desire is thy gift. Ah! my spouse, what has induced thee to visit with so much love a soul so ungrateful, and to bestow upon me so many graces, after all the insults I have offered to thee? With an humble and contrite heart I thank thee for all thy favours: be a thousand times blessed for them. Thou dost invite me to thy love; and I desire to obey thy call. I know the value of this grace, and am resolved never more to be unmindful of thy benefits as I have hitherto been. I love thee, O my sovereign Good! I love thee, O my God! Thou art my only treasure, and the only object of my love. Give me strength to correspond by my affections to the love which thou dost bear me. Grant that I may love thee always; that I may love thee intensely: I ask nothing more. O my mother, Mary, thank thy Son for me, and obtain for me the grace to be faithful to him during the remainder of my life. O Mother of God, in thee I trust. Amen.

CHAPTER VIII.

On the external mortification of the senses.

THERE is no alternative: we poor children of Adam must till death live in continual warfare. "For," says the Apostle, "the flesh lusteth against the spirit"—Gal. v. 17. The flesh desires what the spirit dislikes; and the spirit pants for what the flesh abhors. Now, since it is peculiar to irrational creatures to place all their happiness in sensual enjoyment, and to the angels to seek only the accomplishment of God's will, surely if we attend to the observance of the divine commands, we shall, as a learned author justly says, be transformed into angels; but if we fix our affections on the gratifications of sense, we shall sink to the level of the brute creation. If the soul do not subdue the body, the flesh will conquer the spirit. To maintain his seat on a furious steed, and to escape danger, the horseman must hold a tight rein; and to avoid the corruption of the flesh, we must keep the body in perpetual restraint. We must treat it as a physician treats a patient to whom he prescribes nauseous medicine, and to whom he refuses palatable food. Cruel, indeed, must be the physician who gives to the sick man noxious draughts because they are pleasing to the taste, and who does not administer useful remedies because they are bitter and disgusting. And great is the cruelty of the sensual when, to escape some trifling corporal pain in this life, they expose their souls and bodies to eternal torment in the next. "Such charity," say St. Bernard, "is destructive of charity; such mercy is full of cruelty; because it serves the body so as to destroy the soul"—Apol. ad Guliel. The false love of the flesh destroys the true charity which we owe to ourselves; inordinate compassion towards the body is full of cruelty, because by indulging the flesh it kills the soul. Speaking of sensualists who deride the mortifications of the saints, the same father says, "If we are cruel in crucifying the flesh, you, by sparing it, are far more cruel"—Ser. 10, in Ps. Qui hab. Yes, for by the pleasures of the body in this life you shall merit for soul and body inexpressible torments for ever in the next. A solitary who had emaciated his body by very rigorous austerities, being asked why he treated his body so badly, replied: "I only chastise what chastises me." I torment the enemy who persecutes my soul, and who seeks my destruction. The Abbot Moses being once censured for his severity towards his body, replied: "Let the passions cease, and I will also cease to mortify my flesh. When the flesh ceases to molest me I shall cease to crucify its appetites."

2. If, then, we wish to be saved and to please God, we must take pleasure in what the flesh refuses, and must reject what the flesh demands. Our Lord once said to St. Francis of Assisium: "If you desire my love, use bitters as sweets, and sweets as bitters." Some will say that perfection does not consist in the mortification of the body, but in the abnegation of the will. To them I answer with Father Pinamonti, that the fruit of the vineyard does not consist in the surrounding hedge; but still, if the hedge be taken away you will seek in vain for the produce of the vine. "Where there is no hedge," says the Holy Ghost, "the possession shall be spoiled"—Eccl. xxxvi. 27. So ardent was the desire of Lewis Gonzaga to crucify his flesh, that, although weak in health, he sought nothing but mortifications and penitential rigours: and to a person who once said sanctity does not consist in corporal works of penance, but in the denial of self-will, he wisely answered in the words of the Redeemer: "These things you ought to have done, and not to leave those undone"—Matt. xxiii. 23. He meant to say that, to keep the flesh in subjection to reason, the mortification of the body is necessary, as well as the denial of the will. "I chastise my body," says St. Paul, "and bring into subjection"—1 Cor. ix. 27. The flesh, when indulged, will be brought with difficulty to obey the divine law. Hence, St. John of the Cross, speaking of certain spiritual directors who despise and discourage external penance, says that "he who inculcates loose doctrine regarding the mortification of the flesh should not be believed, though he confirmed his preaching by miracles."

3. The world and the devil are very powerful enemies to our eternal salvation; but our own body, because it is a domestic enemy, is a still more dangerous antagonist. "A domestic enemy," says St. Bernard, "is the worst of foes" —De anima. c. 15. A town that is besieged has more to apprehend from the enemies that are within than from those that are without the walls; because it is far more difficult to ward off the attacks of the former than those of the latter. St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say, that "we should pay no more attention to the body than to the vilest rag." Such, indeed, has been the practice of the saints. As the indulgence of the body by sensual pleasures is the sole and constant study of worldlings, so the continual mortification of the flesh is to the saints the only object of their care and of their desires. St. Peter of Alcantara was accustomed to say to his body: "O my body, keep your peace; I shall give you no rest here below; pains and torments shall be your portion in this life: when we shall be in paradise you will then enjoy that repose which shall never end." Similar was the practice of St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, who, on the bed of death, stated that "she did not remember to have ever taken pleasure in any other object than in God alone." If we read the lives of the saints, and see the works of penance which they performed, we shall be ashamed of the delicacy and of the reserve with which we chastise the flesh. In the lives of the ancient fathers (lib. i. in Vit. S. Euphos.) we read of a large community of nuns who never tasted fruit or wine. Some of them took food only once every day; others never eat a meal except after two or three days of rigorous abstinence: all were clothed, and even slept in hair-cloth. I do not require such austerities from religious of the present day; but is it too much for them to take the discipline several times in the week? to wear a chain round some part of the body till the hour of dinner? not to approach the fire in winter, on some day in each week, and during novenas of devotion? to abstain from fruit and sweetmeats? and, in honour of the Mother of God, to fast every Saturday on bread and water, or at least to be content with one dish?

4. But you will say I am weak, and my director forbids me to practice any corporal austerity. Obey your confessor, but take care to embrace with peace all the troubles of your infirmities, and all the inconveniences arising from the heat or cold of the seasons. If you cannot chastise your body by positive rigour, abstain at least from some lawful pleasures. St. Francis Borgia, when amusing himself in hawk-hunting, used to cast down his eyes when he saw the hawk about to spring upon his prey. St. Lewis Gonzaga always turned away his eyes from the objects of curiosity exhibited at the festivities at which he might be present. Why cannot you practice similar mortification? If denied lawful pleasures, the body will not dare to seek forbidden indulgence; but if continually gratified by every innocent enjoyment it will soon draw the soul into sinful gratifications. Besides, that great servant of God, Father Vincent Carafa, of the Society of Jesus, used to say, that "the Almighty has given us the goods of the earth, not only that we may enjoy them, but also that we may have the means of pleasing him by offering to him his own gifts, and by voluntarily renouncing them in order to show our love for him." It is true, indeed, that certain innocent pleasures assist our weakness, and prepare us for spiritual exercises; but it is likewise true that sensual pleasures poison the soul by attaching her to creatures. Hence, like poison, they must be used sparingly. Poisons, when properly prepared, and taken with moderation, are sometimes conducive to health; and sensual delights, because they are poisonous remedies, must be taken, with great caution and reserve, without attachment to them, only through necessity, and to be better able to serve God.

5. Besides, for the recovery of bodily health, you must take care never to impair the strength of the soul, which will be always weak as long as the flesh is not mortified. "I compassionate," says St. Bernard, "the infirmities of the body; but the infirmity of the soul should be an object of greater alarm"—Eph. 321. I pity the infirmities of the body, but feel great commiseration for the more formidable and dangerous maladies of the soul. Oh! how often is bodily weakness made the pretext for unnecessary indulgence. "We leave the choir," says St. Teresa, "to-day, because the head aches; on to-morrow, because it had ached; and on the day after, lest it should ache"—Cam. di. perf. cap. 10. Hence, in the next chapter, she thus addresses her dear children: "You have entered religion, not to indulge the flesh, but to die for Jesus Christ. If we do not resolve to disregard the want of health, we shall do nothing. What injury will death do us? How often have our bodies molested us? Shall not we torment them in return?" St. Joseph Calasanctius says: "Woe to the religious who loves health more than sanctity." St. Bernard considered it indecent in a religious to take costly medicine; for them, he said, decoctions of herbs should be sufficient. I do not require this of you; but I say, that small, indeed, must be the spiritual progress of the religious who is continually seeking physicians and remedies; who is sometimes not content with the prescription of the ordinary physician: and who, by her discontent, disturbs the whole community. "Men," says Salvian, "devoted to Christ are weak, and wish to be so: if they were robust, they could with difficulty be saints." All, and particularly nuns, who have consecrated themselves to the love of Jesus Christ, are weak in body, and desire to continue in their infirmities; were they strong and vigorous, it would be difficult for them to attain sanctity. The truth of this observation appears from the lives of St. Teresa, St. Rose, St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, and other saints. The venerable Beatrix of the Incarnation, the first spiritual daughter of St. Teresa, though afflicted with pains and infirmities, was accustomed to say, that "she would not exchange her condition for that of the happiest princess on earth." Such was her patience that, in the greatest sufferings, she never uttered a word of complaint. Hence a sister once said to her: "You are like one of those wretched paupers who languish for want of food, but continue to endure the pains of hunger rather than submit to the shame of manifesting their poverty." If bodily weakness renders us unable to practice corporal austerities, let us at least learn from her example to embrace with joy the infirmities with which Almighty God visits us. If borne with patience, they will conduct us to perfection better than voluntary works of penance. St. Sincletica used to say, that "as corporal maladies are cured by medicine, so the diseases of the soul are healed by the infirmities of the body"—In Vit. Pat. lib. 3, c. 26.

6. Oh! how profitable to the spirit are the mortifications of the flesh. They detach the heart from sensual pleasures, which wound the soul, and frequently deprive her of life. "The wounds of charity," says Origen, "make us insensible to the wounds of the flesh"—In Cant. cap. 3. Moreover, by mortifications we atone in this life for the pains due to our sins. He that has offended God, though the offence may be pardoned, must, either by expiatory works in this life, or by the pains of purgatory in the next, make satisfaction for the temporal punishment due to sin after remission of its guilt. His sufferings in purgatory will be infinitely greater than any torments which he could endure on earth. "They shall be in very great tribulation, unless they do penance from their deeds"—Apoc. ii. 22. They who will not have expiated their sins shall suffer the sharpest torments in the other world. St. Anthony relates that an angel proposed to a sick man the choice of being confined to purgatory for three days, or of being condemned to a continuation of his infirmities for two years. The sick man chose the three days in purgatory; but scarcely had an hour elapsed in that place of torments when he began to complain of the angel for having condemned him to a purgation not of three days but of several years. "What!" replied the angel, "your body is still warm on the bed of death, and you speak of having spent years in purgatory." If, blessed sister, you wish to suffer in peace, imagine that you have still to live fifteen or twenty years, and say, this is my purgatory: it is the spirit rather than the body that I must conquer.

7. Mortifications raise the soul to God. St. Francis de Sales used to say that the soul cannot ascend to the throne of God unless the flesh is mortified and depressed. There are many beautiful remarks on this subject in the works of St. Teresa. "It would be folly," says this great Saint, "to think that God admits to his familar friendship those who seek their own ease. Sensuality and prayer are incompatible. Souls who truly love God cannot desire repose."

8. Mortifications merit great glory in heaven. If "every one who striveth for the mastery," abstains from whatever is calculated to diminish his strength, and thus endanger the conquest of a miserable earthly crown, how much more should we deny the flesh for the attainment of an eternal kingdom? "And they, indeed," says St. Paul, "that they may receive a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible one"—1 Cor. ix. 25. St. John saw all the saints with "palms in their hands"—Apoc. vii. 9. From this passage we learn that all the elect must be martyrs, either by the sword of the tyrant or by the voluntary crucifixion of the flesh. But while we meditate on the necessity of works of penance, we should at the same time remember that the pains of this life bear no proportion to the eternal glory that awaits us in paradise. "The sufferings of this life," says St. Paul "are not worthy to be compared with the glory to come that shall be revealed in us"—Rom. viii. 18. The few transitory mortifications which we practice here below will produce complete and everlasting felicity. "For," says the apostle, "that which is at present momentary and light of our tribulation, worketh for us above measure an exceeding weight of glory"—2 Cor. iv. 17.

9. Let us, then, animate our faith. Our pilgrimage on earth will not be of long duration: our home is eternity, where he who shall have practiced the greatest mortifications during life shall enjoy the greatest glory. St. Peter says the saints are the living stones of which the celestial Jerusalem is built. But before they are translated to the city which is above they must be polished by the salutary chisel of penance. "The wholesome chisel often went; many a saving stroke was spent; and the architect dealt heavy blows to polish the stones that compose this pile"—In officio. ded. Eccles. Let us consider each act of self-denial as a work which will prepare us for paradise. This thought will sweeten all our pains and all our toils. How pleasing is the fatigue of a journey to him who is assured that he shall obtain possession of all the territory through which he travels? It is related in the Spiritual Meadow, that a certain monk was anxious to exchange his cell for another nearer to the fountain from which he was accustomed to draw water, but as he was one day going to the fountain he heard his steps counted by a person behind him. Turning round he saw a young man, who said: "I am an angel: I reckon your steps, that none of them may be without a reward." The monk immediately abandoned the intention of changing his cell; and even wished it to be more distant from the water, that he might be able to acquire greater merit.

10. Mortified religious enjoy peace and content in this life as well as in the next. What greater happiness can a soul possess than to know that by her mortifications she pleases God? The very privation of carnal pleasures, and even the pains of penance, are so many spiritual delights to a loving soul. Love cannot be at rest. He that loves God cannot live without giving continual proofs of his affection. Now, a soul cannot give a stronger proof of her love for God than the voluntary renunciation of earthly pleasures for his sake, and the oblation of her pains to him. A Christian enamoured of Jesus Christ, feels no pain in his penitential works. "He that loves," says St. Augustine, "labours not"—In Manual. "Who," says St. Teresa, "can behold his God covered with wounds and harassed by persecutions, without embracing and even desiring a portion of his Saviour's sufferings?" Hence, St. Paul exclaimed that he wished for no other delight or glory than the cross of the Redeemer. "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ" —Gal. vi. 14. Again he says, that the crucifixion of the flesh is the test by which the true lovers of Jesus Christ may be known. "They that are Christ's have crucified their flesh with the vices and concupiscences"—Gal. v. 24. Worldlings go in search of sensual gratifications, but the followers of Christ seek only corporal austerities. In conclusion, blessed sister, imagine that death is at hand, and that as yet you have done but little for paradise. Strive from this day forward to mortify yourself as much as possible, at least by abstinence from the pleasures which self-love seeks. Endeavour to profit of every opportunity of mortification. "Let not the part of a good gift overpass you"—Eccl. xiv. 14. Consider every occasion of self-denial as a gift which God bestows upon you, that you may be able to merit greater glory ir another life; and remember that what is done to-day cannot be performed to-morrow, for time past never returns.

11. To animate your fervour in the practice of mortification I shall here place before your eyes, in his own words, what St. John Climachus saw in a monastery called the Prison of Penitents. "I saw," says the Saint (in Scala. Par. Grad.) "some of them standing the whole night in the open air to overcome sleep. I saw others with their eyes fixed on heaven, and with tears begging mercy from God. Others stood with their hands bound behind their shoulders, and their heads bowed down as if they were unworthy to raise their eyes to heaven. Others remained on ashes, with their heads between their knees, and beat the ground with their foreheads. Others deluged the floor with their tears. Others stood in the burning rays of the sun. Others, parched with thirst, were content with taking a few drops of water to prevent death. Others took a mouthful of bread, and then threw it out, saying "that he who has been guilty of beastly actions is unworthy of the food of men." Some had their cheeks furrowed by continual streams of tears; and others their eyes wasted away. Others struck their breast with such violence that they began to spit blood. And I saw all with faces so pallid and emaciated that they appeared to be so many corpses." The Saint then concludes by saying, that "notwithstanding their fall, he considered them, on account of their penitential rigours, more happy than those who had never sinned and never done penance." What shall be said of them who have fallen, and have never atoned for their crime by expiatory works?

PRAYER.

O my spouse, assist me and give me strength, that for the future I may serve thee better than I have done for the past. Hitherto I have sought the gratification of my senses and of self-love, but have been regardless of offending thee. But for the future I desire only to please thee, who art so deserving of all my love. For the love of me thou hast chosen a life of continual pains and sorrows; thou hast spared nothing to draw me to thy love and shall I continue to be as ungrateful as I have been for so many years? No, my Jesus, it shall not be so; I have sinned enough in my past life. Pardon me all my transgressions; I am sorry for them, and repent with my whole heart of all the displeasure I have given thee by my irregular life. I now love thee with my whole soul, and desire to do all that I can to please thee in all things and without reserve. Through my director make known to me thy will. I now purpose, and hope with the assistance of thy grace, to fulfil thy will in all things. My beloved Redeemer, replenish my memory with holy thoughts, that I may always remember the sorrows which thou hast endured for my sake. Inflame my will with holy affections, that I may seek only what pleases thee, and may desire only the accomplishment of thy will, and to belong entirely to thee. Grant, O Lord, that I may love thee, and that I may love thee ardently. For if I love thee, all pains will be sweet and agreeable to me. Holy Virgin Mary, my mother, assist me to please God during the remainder of my life. In thee I place all my hope. Amen.

SECTION I.

On the mortification of the eyes, and on modesty in general.

1. Almost all our rebellious passions spring from unguarded looks; for, generally speaking, it is by the sight that all inordinate affections and desires are excited. Hence, holy Job "made a covenant with his eyes that he would not so much as think upon a virgin"—Job xxxi. 1. Why did he say that he would not so much as think upon a virgin? Should he not have said that he made a covenant with his eyes not to look at a virgin; because thoughts are so connected with looks that the former cannot be separated from the latter, and therefore, to escape the molestation of evil imaginations, he resolved never to fix his eyes on a woman. St. Augustine says: "The thought follows the look; delight comes after the thought; and consent after delight." From the look proceeds the thought; from the thought the desire ("for," as St. Francis de Sales says, "what is not seen is not desired,") and to the desire succeeds the consent. If Eve had not looked at the forbidden apple, she would not have fallen; but because "she saw that it was good to eat, and fair to the eyes, and beautiful to behold, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat" —Gen. iii. 6. The devil first tempts us to look, then to desire, and afterwards to consent.

2. St. Jerome says, that "Satan requires only a beginning on our part. If we commence he will complete our destruction. A deliberate glance at a person of a different sex often enkindles an infernal spark which consumes the soul." "Through the eyes," says St. Bernard, "the deadly arrows of love enter"—Ser. 13. The first dart which wounds and frequently robs chaste souls of life finds admission through the eyes. By them David, the beloved of God, fell. By them was Solomon, once the inspired of the Holy Ghost, drawn into the greatest abominations. Oh! how many are lost by indulging their sight. The eyes must be carefully guarded by all who expect not to be obliged to join in the lamentation of Jeremiah: "My eye hath wasted my soul"—Jer. Thren. iii. 51. By the introduction of sinful affections my eyes have destroyed my soul. Hence, St. Gregory says, that "the eyes, because they draw us to sin, must be depressed"—Mor. lib. 21, cap. 2. If not restrained, they will become instruments of hell, to force the soul to sin almost against her will. "He that looks at a dangerous object," continues the Saint, "begins to will what he wills not." It was this the inspired writer intended to express, when he said of Holofernes, that "the beauty of Judith made his soul captive"—Judith xvi. 11.

3. Seneca says, that "blindness is a part of innocence." And Tertullian relates that a certain pagan philosopher, to free himself from impurity, plucked out his eyes. Such an act would be unlawful in us; but he that desires to preserve chastity must avoid the sight of objects calculated to excite unchaste thoughts. "Gaze not about," says the Holy Ghost, "upon another's beauty . . . hereby lust is enkindled as a fire"—Eccl. ix. 8, 9. Gaze not upon another's beauty; for from looks arise evil imaginations, by which an impure fire is lighted up. Hence, St. Francis de Sales used to say that "they who wish to exclude an enemy from the city must keep the gates locked."

4. Hence, to avoid the sight of dangerous objects the Saints were accustomed to keep their eyes almost continually fixed on the earth, and to abstain even from looking at innocent objects. After being a novice for a year, St. Bernard could not tell whether his cell was vaulted. In consequence of never raising his eyes from the ground he never knew that there were but three windows to the church of the monastery in which he spent his novitiate. He once, without perceiving a lake, walked along its banks for nearly an entire day; and hearing his companions speak about it he asked when they had seen it. St. Peter of Alcantara kept his eyes constantly cast down, so that he did not know the brothers with whom he conversed: it was by the voice and not by the countenance that he was able to recognize them. The saints were particularly cautious not to look at persons of a different sex. St. Hugh, bishop, when compelled to speak with women, never looked at them in the face. St. Clare would never fix her eyes on the face of a man. She was greatly afflicted because, when raising her eyes at the elevation to see the consecrated host, she once involuntarily saw the countenance of the priest. St. Lewis Gonzaga never looked at his own mother in the face. It is related of St. Arsenius that a noble lady went to visit him in the desert, to beg of him to recommend her to God. When the saint perceived that his visitor was a woman, he turned away from her. She then said to him: "Arsenius, since you will neither see nor hear me, at least remember me in your prayers." "No," replied the saint, "but I will beg of God to make me forget you, and never more to think of you."

5. From these examples may be seen the folly and temerity of some religious who, though they have not the sanctity of a St. Clare, still gaze around from the terrace, in the parlour, and in the church, upon every object that presents itself, even on persons of a different sex. And, notwithstanding their unguarded looks, they expect to be free from temptations and from the danger of sin. For having once looked deliberately at a woman who was gathering ears of corn, the Abbot Pastor was tormented for forty years by temptations against chastity (Dial. L. c. 20.) St. Gregory states, that the temptation, to conquer which St. Benedict rolled himself in thorns, arose from one incautious glance at a female. St. Jerome, though living in a cave at Bethlehem, in continual prayer and macerations of the flesh, was terribly molested by the remembrance of ladies whom he had long before seen in Rome. Why should not similar molestations be the lot of the religious who wilfully and without reserve fixes her eyes on persons of a different sex. "It is not," says St. Francis de Sales, "the look so much as the repetition of it that proves most pernicious." "If," says St. Augustine, "our eyes should by chance fall upon others, let us take care never to fix them upon any one"—In reg. iii. c. 21. Father Manareo, when taking leave of St. Ignatius for a distant place, looked steadfastly in his face: for this look he was corrected by the saint (Lancis. op., 2, n. 304.) From the conduct of St. Ignatius on this occasion, we learn that it was not becoming in religious to fix their eyes on the countenance of a person, even of the same sex, particularly if the person is young. But I do not see how looks at young persons of a different sex can be excused from the guilt of a venial fault, or even from mortal sin, when there is proximate danger of criminal consent. "It is not lawful," says St. Gregory, "to behold what is not lawful to covet." The evil thought which proceeds from looks, though it should be rejected, never fails to leave a stain upon the soul. Brother Ruggiero, a Franciscan of singular purity, being once asked why he was so reserved in his intercourse with females, replied, "that when men avoid the occasions of sin, God preserves them; but when they expose themselves to danger, they are justly abandoned by the Lord, and easily fall into some grievous transgressions" (Lib. i. conform. S. Fran. p. 2.)

6. The indulgence of the eyes, if not productive of any other evil, at least destroys recollection during the time of prayer. For the images and impressions caused by the objects seen before, or by the wandering of the eyes during prayer, will occasion a thousand distractions, and banish all recollection from the soul. It is certain that without recollection a religious can pay but little attention to the practice of humility, patience, mortification, or of the other virtues. Hence, it is her duty to abstain from all looks of curiosity which distract her mind from holy thoughts. Let her eyes be directed only to objects which raise the soul to God. St. Bernard used to say, that "to fix the eyes upon the earth contributes to keep the heart in heaven." "Where," says St. Gregory, "Christ is, there modesty is found"—Epis. 193. Wherever Jesus Christ dwells by love, there modesty is practiced. However, I do not mean to say that the eyes should never be raised or never fixed on any object. No; but they ought to be directed only to what inspires devotion, to sacred images, and to the beauty of creation, which elevate the soul to the contemplation of the Divinity. Except in looking at such objects, a religious should in general keep the eyes cast down, and particularly in places where they may fall upon dangerous objects. In conversing with men, she should never roll the eyes about to look at them, and much less to look at them a second time.

7. To practice modesty of the eyes is the duty of a religious, not only because it is necessary for her own improvement in virtue, but also because it is necessary for the edification of others. God only knows the human heart: man sees only the exterior actions, and by them he is edified or scandalized. "A man," says the Holy Ghost, "is known by his look"—Eccl. xix. 26. By the countenance the interior is known. Hence, like the Baptist, a religious should be "a burning and shining light"—John v. 35. She ought to be a torch burning with charity, and shining resplendent by her modesty to all who behold her. To religious the following words of the Apostle are particularly applicable: "We are made a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men"—1 Cor. iv. 9. And again: "Let your modesty be known to all men: the Lord is nigh"—Phil. iv. 5. Religious are attentively observed by the angels and by men, and therefore their modesty should be made manifest before all: if they do not practice modesty, terrible shall be the account which they must render to God on the day of judgment. Oh! what devotion does a modest religious inspire, what edification does she give by keeping her eyes always cast down? St. Francis of Assisium once said to his companion that he was going out to preach. After walking through the town, with his eyes fixed on the ground, he returned to the convent. His companion asked him when he would preach the sermon? "We have," replied the saint, "by the modesty of our looks given an excellent instruction to all who saw us." It is related of St. Lewis Gonzaga, that when he walked through Rome, the students would stand in the street to observe and admire his great modesty.

8. St. Ambrose says, that to men of the world, the modesty of the Saints is a powerful exhortation to amendment of life. "The look of a just man is an admonition to many"—Ps. cxviii. The saint adds: "How delightful it is to do good to others by your appearance." It is related of St. Bernardine of Sienna, that even when a secular, his presence was sufficient to restrain the licentiousness of his young companions, who, as soon as they saw him, were accustomed to give each other notice of his coming. On his arrival they became silent, or changed the subject of their conversation. It is likewise related of St. Gregory of Nyssa, and of St. Ephrem, that their very appearance inspired piety, and that the sanctity and modesty of their exterior edified all who beheld them. When Innocent the Second visited St. Bernard at Clairvaux, such was the exterior modesty of the saint and of his monks that the Pope and his cardinals were moved to tears of devotion. Surius relates a very extraordinary fact of St. Lucian, a monk and martyr (Die. 7 Jan.) By his modesty he induced so many pagans to embrace the faith that the emperor Maximinian, fearing that he should be converted to Christianity by the appearance of the saint, would not allow the holy man to be brought within his view, but spoke to him from behind a screen. That our Redeemer was the first who taught by his example modesty of the eyes, may, as a learned author remarks, be inferred from the holy evangelists, who say that on some occasions he raised his eyes. "And he, lifting up his eyes on his disciples"—Luke vi. 20. "When Jesus therefore had lifted up his eyes"—John vi. 5. From these passages we may conclude that the Redeemer ordinarily kept his eyes cast down. Hence, the Apostle, praising the modesty of the Saviour, says: "I beseech you, by the mildness and modesty of Christ"—2 Cor. x. 1. I shall conclude this subject with what St. Basil said to his monks: "If, my children, we desire to raise the soul towards heaven, let us direct the eyes towards the earth." From the moment we awake in the morning let us pray continually in the words of holy David: "Turn away my eyes that they may not behold vanity"—Ps. cxviii. 35.

On modesty in general.

9. We must practice modesty, not only in our looks, but also in our whole deportment, and particularly in our dress, our walk, our conversation, and all similar actions. Modesty of dress is not incompatible with neatness or cleanliness. But how disedifying is the conduct of the religious who attends too much to the neatness of her person, and to the fineness or richness of her apparel?—who wears superfluous ornaments?—whose dress is made in a manner calculated to attract notice?—and whose whole appearance exhibits worldly vanity? Speaking of seculars, St. Cyprian says, that "females decorated with gold necklaces and precious stones lose the ornaments of the soul"—De hab. virg. lib. iv. What would the Saint have thought of the religious who imitates worldlings in the vanities of her dress? "The ornaments of a woman are," says St. Gregory Nazianzen, "to be conspicuous for probity; to converse with the divine oracle; to seek wool and take hold of the spindle; and to keep a restraint on her eyes and on her lips"—Adver. mul. se orn. Yes, the ornaments of holy women are probity of life, continual conversation with God by prayer, constant labour, and a perpetual guard over the eyes and tongue by modesty and by silence.

10. A religious should be modest in her walk. "Let your gait," says St. Basil, "be neither slow nor vehement"—Ep. ad Greg. Your walk to be modest must be grave; neither too quick nor too slow. A religious must practice modesty in sitting. She must avoid every slothful posture; she must abstain from crossing the feet, and from putting one leg on the other. She must be modest at meals, by taking her food without avidity, and without rolling her eyes around in all directions, as if to observe how and what the others eat.

11. Above all a religious must be modest in her conversation, by abstaining from all words unbecoming the religious state. She must be pursuaded that all words which savour of the world are indecorous in a religious. "If," says St. Basil, "a worldling make use of scurrilous expressions he is not noticed. But if a man who professes to lead a perfect life appear to depart in the slightest degree from his duty, he is instantly remarked by all"—In reg. qu. 22.

In a secular, no one observes indecent words, because they are common in the world : but if religious, who profess to aspire to sanctity, be guilty of the smallest impropriety, universal attention is immediately directed to their conduct. To observe modesty in words at the common recreation you must attend to the following rules :—First, you must abstain from all murmurings, even against manifest abuses. Secondly, you must never interrupt a person who is speaking. "And," says the Holy Ghost, "interrupt not others in the midst of their discourse"—Eccl. xi. 8. How scandalous is it to see a religious engrossing to herself the whole conversation?—to see her ready to stop the sisters in the middle of a word, or of a sentence, and thus show her pride by pretending to know everything, and constituting herself mistress of all? Such conduct is a source of great annoyance to all who join in the conversation. However, every religious should speak occasionally during the hours of recreation, and particularly when the others are silent : for should all abstain from speaking, the end of the rule which prescribes recreation would be frustrated. But modesty requires, particularly from the young, that, after speaking as much as will be necessary for the ends of the recreation, they show a stronger inclination to listen than to speak. The best rule, then, is to speak when others are silent, and to be silent when others are speaking. Thirdly, you must abstain from certain jests and jocose remarks on the real and known defects of others ; for such jokes offend the persons to whom they are applied. Fourthly, you must never utter a word of self-praise : when you are praised by others, you must raise your heart to God, and change the subject of conversation ; and when you are contradicted or ridiculed, you must not be angry. Whenever the companions of St. John Francis Regis made him the subject of their jests at recreation, he endeavoured with great good humour to keep up the conversation, that, by being the object of their laughter, he might contribute to their amusement. Fifthly, you must speak always in a low tone, and never in such a manner as to offend the ears of others. "Let no one," says St. Ambrose, "offend by too loud a voice"—Lib. i. de off. c. 18. Sixthly, you must observe modesty and moderation in laughter.

St. Gregory relates, that the Mother of God appeared once to a devout virgin, called Musa, and told her that if she wished to please her she must restrain immoderate laughter. "They who seek after piety," says St. Basil, "must take care not to pour forth their souls in laughter." —In reg. ques. 17. All who aspire to perfection should avoid excessive laughter. Moderate laughter, which shows the serenity of the soul, is neither a violation of decorum nor opposed to devotion. A religious should always present an appearance of modesty and devotion but not of sadness and melancholy. By appearing sad and afflicted, she dishonours religion, and gives all who behold her to understand that sanctity, instead of infusing peace and joy, fills the soul with sorrow and melancholy. But by a cheerful countenance she encourages others to the practice of piety. Two courtiers (Rosign. verita et.) of a certain monarch, having witnessed the joy with which an aged monk remained in solitude, renounced the world and remained in his retreat. Seventhly, and lastly, you must not speak of things of the world: such as marriages, feasts, comedies, or of splendid dresses: you must not speak of eating, nor praise nor censure the dishes that are brought to table. St. Francis de Sales used to say, that "a man of spirit never thinks of the table but when he sits at it." When religious hear unseemly discourses, they should, like St. Lewis Gonzaga, propose some useful question, or take occasion, from what is said, to introduce some pious subject of conversation. To be able to converse with his companions on spiritual subjects during recreation, he was accustomed to spend, each day, half an hour in reading the life of a saint, or some other book of devotion. When among the juniors, he was the first to introduce a religious subject: when with priests, or with his seniors, he proposed a case of conscience, as if for his own information, and thus succeeded in making the conversation turn upon holy things. In a short time his companions knew that he did not relish any but pious conversation, and therefore they sought on every occasion to gratify his wishes: should they happen to be discoursing on any other subject when he came among them, they would immediately begin to speak on God. Every one is inclined to speak continually of what he tenderly loves. St. Ignatius of Loyola appeared not to know how to speak of anything but God, and was therefore called the Father who speaks always of God.

PRAYER.

My Jesus, pardon me, for Thy mercy's sake, the numberless faults which I have committed for want of sufficient modesty, and of which I now repent with my whole heart. All my defects have arisen from my little love of thee. I acknowledge that I do not deserve mercy; but thy wounds and thy death encourage and oblige me to hope. O my God! how often have I insulted thee? And with what tendernes hast thou pardoned all my sins? I have promised to be faithful to thee, and still I have returned to my sin? Shall I wait till thou abandon me to my tepidity and thus to eternal misery? I desire, O Lord, to amend; and I place all my confidence in thee, and purpose to seek continually thy assistance to be faithful to thee. Hitherto I have trusted in my own resolution, and have neglected to recommend myself to thee. This self-confidence and neglect of prayer have been the cause of my past sins. Eternal Father, through the merits of Jesus Christ, have mercy upon me and assist me; give me grace to recommend myself to thee in all my wants. I love thee, O my Sovereign Good, and desire to love thee with all my strength; but without thee I can do nothing. Give me thy love; give me holy perseverance. I hope for all things from thy infinite goodness. O Mary, Mother of God, thou knowest how much I confide in thee; assist me, have pity on me. Amen.

SECTION II.

On the mortification of the appetite.

1. St. Andrew Avellini used to say that he who wishes to advance in perfection should begin zealously to mortify the appetite. "It is impossible," says St. Gregory, "to engage in the spiritual conflict without the previous subjugation of the appetite"—Mor. L. xxx. c. 13. Father Roggacci, in his "Treatise on the one thing necessary," asserts that the principal part of external mortification consists in the mortification of the palate. Since the mortification of the taste consists in abstinence from food, must we then abstain altogether from eating? No; it is our duty to preserve the life of the body, that we may be able to serve God as long as he wills us to remain on earth. But, as Father Vincent Caraffa used to say, "we should attend to the body with the same feelings of disgust as a powerful monarch would perform, by compulsion, the meanest work of a servant." "We must," says St. Francis de Sales, "eat in order to live; but we should not live as if for the purpose of eating." Some, like beasts, appear to live only for the gratification of the palate. "A man," says St. Bernard, "becomes a beast by loving what beasts love." Whoever, like brute animals, fixes his heart on the indulgence of the appetite, falls from the dignity of a spiritual and rational creature, and sinks to the level of senseless beasts. Unhappy Adam, for the pleasure of eating an apple, is "compared to senseless beasts, and is become like to them." In another place, St. Bernard says "that on seeing Adam forget his God and his eternal salvation for the momentary gratification of his palate, the beasts of the fields, if they could speak, would exclaim: "Behold, Adam is become one of us"—In Cant. Ser. 35. Hence, St. Catherine of Sienna used to say, that "without mortifying the taste it is impossible to preserve innocence, since it was by the indulgence of his appetite that Adam fell. Ah! how miserable is the condition of those "whose God is their belly"—Phil. iii. 19.

2. How many have lost their souls by intemperance? In his Dialogues (lib. iv. c. 38,) St. Gregory relates that, in a monastery of Sienna, there was a monk who led a very exemplary life. When he was at the point of death, the religious, expecting to be edified by his last moments, gathered around him. "Brethren," said the dying man, "when you fasted I eat in private, and therefore I have been already delivered over to Satan, who now deprives me of life, and carries away my soul." After these words he expired. The same saint relates, in another place (dial. 1, c. 4,) that "a certain nun, seeing in the garden a very fine lettuce, pulled and eat it, in opposition to her rule. She was instantly possessed by a devil, who tormented her grievously. Her companions called to her aid the holy Abbot Ebuitius, at whose arrival the demon exclaimed: "What evil have I done? I sat upon the lettuce: she came and eat it." The holy man, by his commands, compelled the evil spirit to depart. In the Cistercian records (Vinc. spec. hist. lib. vii. c. 108) we read that St. Bernard, once visiting his novices, called aside a brother whose name was Acardo, and said that a certain novice, to whom he pointed, would, on that day, fly from the monastery. The saint begged of Acardo to watch the novice, and to prevent his escape. On the following night, Acardo saw a demon approach the novice, and, by the savoury smell of a roasted fowl, tempt him to desire forbidden food. The unhappy young man awoke, and, yielding to the temptation, took his clothes and prepared to leave the monastery. Acardo endeavoured, in vain, to convince him of the dangers to which he would be exposed in the world. Overcome by gulosity, the unhappy man obstinately resolved to return to the world: there (the narrator adds) he died miserably.

3. Let us, then, take care not to be conquered by this brutal vice. St. Augustine says that "food is necessary for the support of life: but, like medicine, it should be taken only through necessity." Intemperance is very injurious to the body as well as to the soul. It is certain that excess in eating is the cause of almost all the diseases of the body. Apoplexy, diarrhœa, headaches, complaints of the stomach and bowels, and innumerable other maladies, spring from the immoderate use of food. But the diseases of the body are only a small part of the evils that flow from intemperance: its effects on the soul are far more disastrous. This vice, according to St. Thomas (2. 2. qu. 148, a. 6,) in the first place darkens the soul, and renders her unfit for spiritual exercises, but particularly for mental prayer. As fasting prepares the mind for the contemplation of God and of eternal good, so intemperance diverts it from holy thoughts. St. Chrysostom says, that "the glutton, like an overloaded ship, moves with difficulty; and that, in the first tempest of temptation, he is in danger of being lost."

4. "Take," says St. Bernard, "even bread with moderation, lest a loaded stomach should make you weary of prayer"—In Cant. Ser. 66. And again he says: "If you compel a person who takes a heavy meal to watch, you will extort from him wailing, rather than singing"—Apolad Guillel. Hence, it is the duty of religious to eat sparingly, and particularly at supper: for in the evening a false appetite is frequently created by the acid produce of the food taken at dinner. Whoever satisfies his appetite in the evening is exposed to great danger of excess; and, in consequence of indigestion, will frequently feel his stomach overburdened in the morning, and his head so stupid and confused that he will not be able to say an Ave Maria. Do not imagine that the Almighty will, at the time of prayer, infuse his consolations into the souls of those who, like senseless beasts, seek delight in the indulgence of the appetite. "Divine consolation," says St. Bernard, "is not given to those who admit any other delight"—Ser. 6, de Ascen. Celestial consolations are not bestowed on those who go in search of earthly pleasures.

5. Besides, he who gratifies the taste will readily indulge the other senses: for, having lost the spirit of recollection, he will easily commit faults, by indecent words and by unbecoming gestures. But the greatest evil of intemperance is that it exposes chastity to great danger. "Repletion of the stomach," says St. Jerome, "is the hotbed of lust"—In Jov. Excess in eating is a powerful incentive to incontinence. Hence Cassian says, that "it is impossible for him who satiates his appetite not to experience conflicts"—Inst. lib. ix. c. 13. The intemperate cannot expect to be free from temptations against purity. To preserve chastity the saints practiced the most rigorous mortifications of the appetite. "The devil," says St. Thomas, "vanquished by temperance, does not tempt to lust." When his temptations to indulge the palate are conquered, he ceases to provoke incontinence.

6. He that attends to the abnegation of the appetite makes continual progress in virtue. That the mortification of the palate will facilitate the conquest of the other senses, and enable us to employ them in acts of virtue, may be inferred from the following prayer of the Church: "O God, who by this bodily fast extinguishest our vices, elevatest our understanding, bestowest on us virtue and its reward"—Preface for Lent. By fasting the Lord enables the soul to subdue her vices, to raise her affections above the earth, to practice virtue, and to acquire merits for eternity. Worldlings say: God has created the goods of this earth for our use and pleasure. Such is not the language of the saints. The venerable Vincent Caraffa, of the Society of Jesus, used to say, that God has given us the goods of the earth, not only that we may enjoy them, but also that we may have the means of thanking him, and showing him our love by the voluntary renunciation of his gifts, and by the oblation of them to his glory. To abandon, for God's sake, all worldly enjoyments, has always been the practice of holy souls. The ancient monks, as St. Jerome relates, thought it a great defect to make use of food dressed with fire. Their daily sustenance consisted of a pound of bread. St. Lewis Gonzaga, though always sickly, fasted three times in the week on bread and water. St. Francis Xavier, during his missions, was satisfied each day with a few grains of toasted rice. St. John Francis Regis, in the great fatigues of his missions, took no other food than a little flour steeped in water. The daily support of St. Peter of Alcantara was but a small quantity of both. We read in the life of the venerable brother John Joseph of the Cross, who lived in our own days, and with whom I was intimately acquainted, that for twenty-four years he fasted very often on bread and water, and never eat anything but bread and a little herbs or fruit. When commanded, on account of his infirmities, to use warm food, he took only bread dipped in broth. When the physician ordered him to take a little wine, he mixed it with his broth to increase the insipidity of his scanty repast. I do not mean to say that to attain sanctity it is necessary for nuns to imitate these examples: but I assert that whoever is attached to the pleasures of the table, or does not seriously attend to the mortification of the appetite, will never make any considerable progress in perfection. In religious communities there are generally two refections in the day: hence they who neglect the mortification of the taste will daily commit a thousand faults.

7. Let us now come to the practice of denying the appetite. In what is it to be mortified? St. Bonaventure answers: "In the quantity, the quality, and the manner"—De prof. rel. L. ii. c. 47. "In the quality," adds the Saint, "by seeking not what is delicate, but what is simple." The Saint says in another place, that "small is the progress of the religious who is not content with what is offered to her, but requires that it be prepared in a different manner, or seeks more palatable food." A mortified religious is satisfied with what is placed before her, and instead of seeking after delicacies, she selects, among all the dishes that may be presented to her, the least palatable, provided it be not prejudicial to health. Such was the practice of St. Lewis Gonzaga, who always chose what was most disagreeable to the taste. "Wine and flesh," says Clement of Alexandria, "give strength indeed to the body, but they render the soul languid"—Storm. l. vii. From the sacred canons we learn that formerly monks were not permitted even to taste flesh. "To a monk, the privilege of either taking or of tasting flesh is not granted"—De consec. dist. 5. Speaking of himself, St. Bernard says: "I abstain from flesh lest I should cherish the vices of the flesh"—Ser. 66, in Cant. "Give not wine to kings," says the wise man—Prov. xxxi. 4. By kings, in this place, we are to understand not the monarchs of the earth, but the servants of God, who rule their wicked passions, and subject them to reason. In another place Solomon says: "Who hath woe? * * * Surely they that pass their time in wine, and study to drink off their cups"—Prov. xxiii. 30. Since, then, the word woe in the sacred Scriptures, according to St. Gregory, signifies everlasting misery, woe, eternal woe, shall be the lot of all who are addicted to wine! Because "wine is a luxurious thing"(Prov. xx. 1), and incites to incontinence. "My first advice," says St. Jerome, in one of his epistles to the virgin Eustochia, "is, that the spouse of Christ fly from wine as from poison. Wine and youth are a two-fold incentive to pleasure"—Ep. 22. If you desire to preserve the chastity which becomes the spouse of Jesus, avoid wine as poison; wine and youth are a double fire, which kindle the desire of unlawful pleasures. From the words of the holy doctor we may infer that he who has not enough of courage or of bodily strength to abstain altogether from flesh and from wine, should, at least, use them with great moderation: otherwise he must be prepared for continual molestation from temptations against purity.

8. A mortified religious would also do well to abstain from superfluous seasonings, which serve only to gratify the palate. The seasonings used by the saints were ashes, aloes, and wormwood. I do not require such mortifications of you, neither do I recommend very extraordinary fasts. On the contrary, it is, according to Cassian, "the duty of all who are not solitaries, and who live in community, to avoid, as a source of much vain-glory, whatever is not conformable to the common usage of the monastery. "Where," says St. Philip Neri, "there is a common table, all should eat of what is served up." Hence, he frequently exhorted his disciples to "avoided all singularity as the origin of spiritual pride." A courageous religious finds opportunities of practicing mortification without allowing it to appear to others. St. John Climachus partook of whatever was placed before him; but his refection consisted in tasting rather than in eating what was offered to him; and thus, by his abstemiousness, he practiced continual mortification of the appetite without the danger of vanity. St. Bernard used to say, that "he who lives in community will take more pleasure in fasting once, while his companions at table take their ordinary repast, than in fasting seven times with them." However, religious may, without the danger of vain-glory, occasionally perform very rigorous mortifications. For example, by living on bread and water on days of devotion, on Fridays and Saturdays, on the vigils of the Blessed Virgin, and on similar occasions; for such fasts are ordinarily practiced by fervent religious.

9. If, on account of bodily infirmity, or through want of fervour, you do not practice rigid fasts, you should at least not complain of the common fare, and should be content with whatever is brought to table. St. Thomas never asked for particular food, but was always satisfied with what was placed before him, and eat of it with great moderation. Of St. Ignatius we read that he never refused any dish, and never complained that the food was not well dressed or well seasoned. It is the duty of the superior to provide the community with wholesome food, but a religious should never complain when what is laid before her is rare or overdone, when it is scanty, smoked, insipid, or too highly seasoned with salt. The poor, provided they receive what is necessary for the support of life, take what is offered to them without conditions or complaints; and a religious should, in like manner, accept whatever is laid before her as alms from Almighty God.

10. With regard to the quantity, St. Bonaventure says, that "food ought not to be taken too often, or in excess, but in such a quantity that it may be a refection, and not a burthen to the body." Hence, the rule of all who seek perfection is never to eat to satiety. "Let your repast be moderate," says St. Jerome, "so that the stomach will never be replete"—Epist. 22, ad Eust. Some religious fast one day and eat to excess on the next. St. Jerome says, that "it is better to take always a reasonable quantity of food, than to fast sometimes, and afterwards to commit excess." The same holy doctor remarks that "satiety is to be avoided in the use, not only of delicacies, but also of the coarsest food"—In Jov. lib. 2. If a nun commits excess—it matters not whether she eat of partridges or of pulse—the bad effects of her intemperance are the same in both cases. St. Jerome's rule for determining the quantity of food, is that "a person should always rise from the table in such a state that he may be able to apply immediately to prayer or to study. "When," says the holy doctor, "you eat, think that it will be your duty to pray or to read immediately after"—Epist. ad Furiam. An ancient father wisely said, that "he who eats a great deal, and is still hungry, will receive a greater reward than the man who eats little, and is satiated." Cassian relates (Inst. lib. 5, cap. 26), that "to comply with the duty of hospitality, a certain monk was one day obliged to sit at table very often with strangers, and to partake of the refreshment prepared for them ; and that, after all, he got up the last time with an appetite. This is the best and most difficult sort of mortification ; for it is easier to abstain altogether from certain meats, than, after having tasted them, to eat but little.

11. He who desires to practice moderation in eating would do well to diminish his meals gradually, till, by experience, he ascertains the quantity of food necessary to support the body. It was in this manner that St. Dorothy trained his disciple, St. Dositheus, to the just practice of mortification. But the most secure means or removing all doubts and scruples with regard to fasts and abstinence is to follow the advice of your director. St. Bernard says, that mortifications which are performed without the permission of one's confessor are not meritorious, because they are the fruit of a criminal presumption. "What is done without the permission of the spiritual father will be regarded as presumption, and shall not be rewarded"—In Reg. cap. 49. All, but particularly nuns, should make it a general rule to eat sparingly at supper, even when there is some apparent necessity for a plentiful meal; for in the evening all are subject to a false appetite, and therefore a slight excess will occasion, on the following morning, headaches, fulness of the stomach, and, by consequence, a repugnance and incapacity for all spiritual exercises.

12. Abstinence from drink, except at meals, may be safely observed by all, unless when, in particular circumstances, such as in the heats of summer, the want of liquid might be prejudicial to health. However, St. Laurence Justinian, even in the burning heats of summer, never drank out of meals; and to those who asked how he could bear the thirst, he replied: "How shall I be able to bear the burning thirst of purgatory if I cannot now abstain from drink?" On fast days, the ancient Christians abstained from drink till the hour of their repast, which was always taken in the evening. Such is the practice of the Turks to the present day, during their fasts of Lent. We should, at least, observe the rule which is universally prescribed by physicians, not to take any drink for four or five hours after dinner.

13. With regard to the manner of eating, St. Bonaventure says, that "food should not be taken unseasonably, nor inordinately, but religiously." Food should not be taken unseasonably; that is, before the hours prescribed for the community. To a penitent who could not abstain from eating till the hours of meals, St. Philip Neri said: "Child, if you do not correct this defect you will never advance in virtue." "Blessed," says the Holy Ghost, "is the land whose princes eat in due season"—Eccl. x. 17. And happy the monastery whose members never eat out of the hours of meals. When St. Teresa heard that some of her nuns had asked permission from the provincial to keep eatables in their cells, she reproved them very severely: "Your request," said the saint, "if granted, would lead to the destruction of the monastery."

14. To avoid the fault of taking your food inordinately, you must be careful not to eat with avidity, with eagerness, or with haste. "Be not greedy in your feasting," says the Holy Ghost—Eccl. xxxvii. 32. Your object in eating must be to support the strength of the body, and to be able to serve the Lord. To eat through mere pleasure cannot be excused from the guilt of venial sin; for Innocent XI. has condemned the proposition which asserts that it is not a sin to eat or to drink from the sole motive of satisfying the palate. However, it is not a fault to feel pleasure in eating; for it is, generally speaking, impossible to eat without experiencing the delight which food naturally produces. But it is a defect to eat like beasts, through the sole motive of sensual gratification, and without proposing any reasonable end. Hence, the most delicious meats may be eaten without sin, if the motive be good and worthy of a rational creature; and in taking the coarsest food through attachment to pleasure, there may be a fault. In the Lives of the Fathers it is related that, "though the same food was served to all the monks of a certain monastery, a holy bishop saw some of them feasting on honey, others on bread, and others on mire"—Lib. de Provid. cap. 25. By this vision he was given to understand that the first eat with a holy fear of violating temperance, and were accustomed at meals to raise their souls to God by holy aspirations; that the second felt some delight in eating, but still returned thanks to God for his benefits; and that the third eat for the mere gratification of the taste.

15. To practice temperance in the manner of eating, you must not perform indiscreet fasts, which would render you unable to serve the community, or to observe your rule. Transported with a certain fervour, by which the Almighty animates their zeal for virtue, beginners are often very indiscreet in their fasts and other works of penance. Their rigours sometimes bring on infirmities which disqualify them for the duties of the community, and sometimes make them give up all exercises of piety. Discretion is necessary in all things. A master who entrusts a servant with the care of a horse will be equally displeased whether the animal be rendered unfit for use by any excess or by a want of food. St. Francis de Sales used to say to his nuns of the Visitation, that "continual moderation is better than fits of violent abstinence, interspersed with occasional excesses. Besides, such abstinences make us esteem ourselves more holy than others who do not practice them." It is certainly the duty of all to avoid indiscretion, but it has been justly remarked by a great spiritual master (and the remark deserves attention,) that "the spirit seldom deceives us by suggesting excessive mortifications; while the flesh, under false pretences, frequently claims commiseration, and procures an exemption from what is displeasing to its propensities."

16. Abstinence from delicacies agreeable to the taste, and in some measure injurious to health, is a very useful mortification. It will also be very profitable to refrain from the fruits which come first into season, and throughout the year from some particular fruit determined by lot; to abstain once or twice in the week from all fruit, and every day from a portion of what is laid before you; to deny yourself some delicacy, or merely to taste it, and say with St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, that it is not useful for you; and to leave every day, according to the advice of St. Bernard, a part of what is most pleasing to the palate. "Let every one," says the saint, "offer at table something to God"—In Reg. cap. 49. It will be very salutary to check for some time the desire of drinking or of eating what is before you, and to abstain from wine, spirits, and spices. Such abstinence is particularly useful for young persons. The preceding mortifications may be practiced without pride or injury to health. It is not necessary to perform all of them. Let each person observe the abstinence which her superior or director permits. It is certainly better to practice small and frequent works of penance, than to perform rare and extraordinary fasts, and afterwards lead an unmortified life. With regard to the other acts of self-denial which may be practiced in the refectory, observe the directions given in the 24th chapter, which treats of the rule of life.

PRAYER.

My dear Redeemer, I am so tepid and full of defects that I am ashamed to appear before thee. Had I corresponded with Thy graces I should now be a seraph by the ardour of my love. But I am more imperfect than ever. How often have I promised to become a saint, and to consecrate myself entirely to Thee? But my promises have been so many treasons. I console myself with the reflection that I have to deal with infinite goodness. Do not abandon me, O Lord, but continue to strengthen me, for I desire to amend by the assistance of thy grace. I do not wish to resist the love which thou bearest me; I see that thou dost wish me to become a saint: and to please thee, I desire to sanctify my soul. I promise to mortify my senses, particularly by abstaining from certain pleasures. (Name them.) Ah! my Jesus, I know that to gain my heart thou hast done too much. Great, indeed, would be my ingratitude if I denied thee anything, or loved thee but little. I do not wish to be any longer ungrateful. Thou hast been infinitely good to me; I shall not be ungenerous to thee, as I have hitherto been. I love thee, O my spouse; I am sorry for all the displeasure I have given thee. Pardon me, and assist me to be faithful to thee. O Mary, thou hast always been faithful to God: obtain for me the gift of fidelity to his graces during the remainder of my life. Amen.

SECTION III.

On the mortification of the senses of hearing, of smell, and of touch.

The sense of hearing must be mortified, by not listening to indecent words, to detraction, or to worldly conversations, which fill the mind with a thousand thoughts and images that afterwards distract and disturb the soul in prayer and in the other exercises of devotion. Should you ever happen to be present at such discourses, endeavour to cut them short by proposing some useful question. If that be not sufficient you ought either to retire or remain silent, and cast down your eyes to show how much you dislike such language. To mortify the smell you must abstain from the use of perfumes and of scented waters; such delicacies are unbecoming even in worldlings. Animated by the spirit of charity and mortification, the Saints felt as much delight in the offensive odours which surround the sick and the infected as they would in a garden of the most fragrant flowers. Let it be your study to imitate their example, and to bear patiently the disagreeable smell which you may experience in the rooms of the sick. With regard to the touch, you must take the greatest care to avoid all, even the smallest defects. For every fault committed by the indulgence of that sense exposes the soul to the danger of eternal death. I cannot explain myself fully on this subject; I shall only say, that to preserve the precious jewel of purity, religious should observe all possible modesty and caution, not only towards others, but also towards themselves. Even in his last agony, St. Peter of Alcantara would not allow any of his brethren to touch any part of his body. Feeling himself touched by one of them, he exclaimed: "Withdraw, touch me not; I am still alive, and may still offend God." This sense of touch must be kept under the greatest restraint by external mortifications, of which I shall now speak.

2. These mortifications are reduced to four heads—to fasts, hair-cloths, disciplines, and watchings. In the preceding section enough has been said of fasting. Hair-cloths are of various kinds: some are made of strong or coarse hair, the others are bands or chains of brass or iron wire. The former may be injurious to persons of a delicate constitution, for, as Father Scaramelli justly remarks (tom. i. tract. 2, art. 1, c. 4,) they inflame the flesh and weaken the stomach, by drawing its natural heat to the external surface of the body. The latter may be worn on the arms, legs, or shoulders, without injury to the health; but not on the breast or round the body. These are the ordinary species of hair-cloths, and may be safely used by all. Far different from them were the hair-cloths worn by the saints. D. Sancia Carriglio, the celebrated penitent of Father M. Avila, wore a shirt of coarse hair, which reached from the neck to the knees. St. Rose of Lima used a long hair shirt, interwoven with needles, and carried a broad chain round her loins. St. Peter of Alcantara wore on his shoulders a large plate of iron, which was so rough, and covered with sharp projections, that it kept the flesh in a state of continual laceration. Would it then be too much for you to wear a small band of iron from morning till the hour of dinner?

3. Disciplines, or flagellations, are a species of mortification strongly recommended by St. Francis de Sales, and universally adopted in religious communities of both sexes. All the modern saints, without a single exception, have continually practiced this sort of penance. It is related of St. Lewis Gonzaga, that he often scourged himself into blood three times in the day. And, at the point of death, not having sufficient strength to use the lash, he besought the provincial to have him disciplined from head to foot. Surely, then, it would not be too much for you to take the discipline once in the day, or, at least, three or four times in the week. However, the practice of this penance should be regulated by the confessor.

4. Lastly, vigils, or watchings, consist in the retrenchment of sleep. It is related of St. Rose, that, to prevent sleep, and thus be able to spend the night in prayer, she tied her hair to a nail fastened in the wall. When she was overcome by sleep, the inclination of the head caused pain sufficient to wake her. Of St. Peter of Alcantara we read, that for forty years he slept but an hour, or, at the most, an hour and a half, each night; and, that he might not be overcome by sleep, he lay with his head on a piece of wood fixed in the wall of his cell. Such austerities cannot be practiced by all, nor without a special grace. Indeed, watching is a species of penance in which great moderatian and discretion should be observed. Severe watchings generally render us unfit for the exercise of the mental faculties, for the recitation of the office, for prayer, and spiritual reading. St. Charles Borromeo, in consequence of watching during the night, was sometimes overcome by sleep, even during public functions, and was, therefore, obliged to prolong the time for rest. However, they who pretend to virtue, should not, like brute animals, give to their body all the repose which the flesh desires. It is necesssary to take as much rest as is requisite, and no more. Generally speaking, females require less sleep than men. In general, five or at the most, six hours' sleep, is sufficient for females. At least, O blessed sister, be careful to rise at the first sound of the morning bell, and not to remain, like the sluggard, turning about in bed, after having heard the signal for rising. St. Teresa used to say, that a religious should leap out of bed the instant she hears the bell.

5. The saints have not only curtailed the time for sleep, but have also practiced various mortifications in the manner of taking repose. St. Lewis Gonzaga was accustomed to scatter fragments of wood and of stones over his bed. St. Rose of Lima lay on the trunks of trees, the space between which was filled with broken earthenware. The venerable Sister Mary Crucified, of Sicily, used a pillow of thorns. These austerities are extraordinary, and are not adapted to all persons. But a religious should not seek a bed of down: if a straw bed be not injurious to her health, why should she require a mattress of hair?—or, if a single mattress be sufficient for her, why does she make use of two?

6. To bear with patience the excessive heat or cold of the seasons is a very useful mortification of the sense of touch. St. Peter of Alcantara went barefooted and bareheaded throughout the winter, and never wore more than a single coat, which was generally torn. You cannot practice such rigours: but would it be to much for you to refrain from approaching the fire during the winter? St. Lewis Gonzaga, even when he lived in Lombardy, where the cold is very intense, never approached the fire. You can at least on one day of the week bear with patience, and accept as a penance from the hands of God, the cold and heats of the seasons. St. Francis Borgia, on his arriving one night at a college in the country, found the gates locked, and was therefore obliged to remain all night under the snow, which fell heavily. In the morning the religious expressed great regret at what had happened. "Be assured," replied the Saint, "that, though I suffered much in the body, I have been greatly consoled in spirit by the reflection, that God rejoiced at my pains: it appeared to me that God himself sent me from heaven the drops of snows which fell upon me."

PRAYER.

My beloved Redeemer, I blush to apper before thee with so many attachments to earthly pleasures. During life thou hast thought of nothing but of suffering for me. But, forgetful of thy pains and of thy love for me, I have hitherto attended only to my own gratification. In my past life I have had nothing of the character of a religious and of thy spouse, except the habit and the name. I deserve to be banished from this holy place, where thou hast favoured me with so many lights and graces, which I have always repaid with ingratitude. I have certainly made many good purposes; and though I have frequently promised, I have not fulfilled them. O my Jesus, give me strength: I desire to do something for thee before I die. If I were now to die, how unhappy should I be? Thou dost prolong my life that I may become a saint. I desire to be perfect: I love thee, O my God and my spouse, and I desire to love thee as becomes thy spouse. I wish to think only of pleasing thee. Pardon me all the offences I have hitherto offered to thee: I detest them with my whole heart. O God of my soul, to gratify myself I have insulted thee, my treasure and my life, who hast loved me so much. Assist me to give myself entirely to thee from this day forward. Holy Virgin Mary, my hope, come to my aid, and obtain for me the grace to do something for God before the hour of my death. Amen.

CHAPTER IX.

ON RELIGIOUS POVERTY.

SECTION I.

On the perfection of poverty.

1. All the views of the world are opposed to the laws of God. In the estimation of the world, riches are the basis of greatness; but in the eyes of God poverty is the foundation of sanctity. It is not certain that the rich are damned; but the Redeemer has declared that "it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven." Hence, founders of every religious order have endeavoured to establish in all communities of their institute a perfect spirit of poverty, as the basis of the common good. St. Ignatius called religious poverty the fortification by which the spirit of fervour is preserved. The truth of this observation is demonstrated by daily experience: for in the communities where poverty is maintained fervour flourishes, and where poverty is violated irregularities soon prevail. Hence, the powers of hell labour so hard to introduce a relaxation of poverty into the observant orders. Speaking of her own religious, St. Teresa once said from heaven: "Let them endeavour to have a great esteem for poverty; for while it lasts fervour will be maintained." Poverty is justly styled by the holy fathers the guardian of virtues; since, in religious, it preserves mortification, humility, detachment from creatures, and, above all, interior recollection.

2. In treating of religious poverty, it is necessary to distinguish between the perfection of poverty and that which is the object of the religious vow. The vow implies that a religious has no dominion over worldly goods, and that her use of them is dependent on the will of her superior. But, alas! this is a rock on which many religious are lost. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi saw many nuns in hell for the transgression of the vow of poverty. In the chronicles of the Capuchins it is related that the devil once took away from among his brethren, and in their presence, a religious, from whose sleeve, at the moment of his being carried off, a breviary fell, which the unhappy man had, in violation of the vow of poverty, appropriated to his own use. The fact related by St. Cyril to St. Augustine is still more alarming. (Inter Epis. S. Aug. 209.) In Thebais there was a convent containing two hundred nuns, who did not live according to the rules of holy poverty. St. Jerome appeared to one of them who was more exact than the rest, and commanded her to admonish the abbess and the other nuns that, if they did not amend, a frightful chastisement should be inflicted upon them. The good religious executed the command, but her advice was received with derision. While at prayer, she was again commanded to repeat the admonition, and, should it be fruitless, to depart immediately from the convent. She obeyed a second time, but the abbess, instead of profiting by the advice, threatened to expel the sister from the monastery, if she said any more on the subject. "You shall not," replied the nun, "expel me, for I will depart instantly, that I may not be involved in the common ruin." Scarce had she got out when the monastery fell, and crushed to death all the religious.

3. Woe to them who introduce into religion a relaxation of holy poverty. Examine, O blessed sister, whether you keep money or any other kind of property without leave. And remember that the permission of the superior is invalid whenever its object is not just: for she cannot permit you retain what cannot be lawfully kept. All the money, furniture, clothes, and whatever species of property you possess, all that you receive from your relatives, or for the fruits of your industry, belong not to you, but to the monastery. You have only the use of what the superior gives you. Hence, if you dispose of anything without her leave, you are guilty of theft, and of a sacreligious theft, by violating the vow of poverty. Be persuaded that the Lord will demand a very rigorous account. Hence, zealous superiors are always most exact and severe in chastising every fault against that virtue. Cassian relates (Ins. cap. 20,) that among the ancient fathers, the procurator, in consequence of allowing a few lentils to be wasted through negligence, was deprived of the benefit of common prayers, and was excluded from the holy communion till he had done public penance. It is related of Rinald, the prior of the Dominican convent at Bologna, that he chastised very severely a lay brother for having taken, without permission, a shred of cloth to mend his habit, and that he caused the cloth to be burned, at chapter, in presence of the whole community.

4. What has been just said regards the vow of poverty: but the perfection of holy poverty requires that a religious be divested of every affection for the goods of the earth, and that she make use of them only as far as is necessary for the preservation of life. It was this that the Redeemer wished to signify to the young man, who asked what he should do in order to attain perfection. "If," says Jesus, "thou wilt be perfect, go sell what thou hast, and give it to the poor"—Matt. xix. 21. The Saviour told him that he should renounce all his possessions without a single exception. "For when," as St. Bonaventure says, "the spirit is encumbered with the weight of any temporality, the soul cannot rise to an union with God." "Burdened with the load of temporal things, the spirit cannot ascend to God"—Med. c. viii. "The love of terrestrial objects," according to St. Augustine, "is the birdlime of the spiritual wings, which impedes the flight of the soul to God." And again, the holy doctor says: "By the great wing of poverty a Christian quickly flies to heaven." Hence, St. Laurence Justinian exclaimed: "O blessed voluntary poverty! possessing nothing, fearing nothing; always cheerful, always abounding, because it turns to advantage every inconvenience"—Inst. de rel. c. ii.

5. It was for our edification and instruction that Jesus Christ wished to live in continual poverty on earth. Hence, St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi called poverty the spouse of Jesus. "Poverty," says St. Bernard, "was not found in heaven—it abounded on earth; but man did not know its value, therefore the Son of God, longing after it, came down from heaven to choose it for himself, and to make it precious to us"—Ser. in Vig. Nat. "Being rich," says St. Paul, "he became poor for your sakes, that through his poverty you might be rich"—2 Cor. viii. 9. Our Redeemer was the Lord of all the riches in heaven and on earth, but he wished to be miserably poor in this life, in order to enrich us, and to excite us by his example to the love of poverty, which, by withdrawing our effections from temporal goods, procures for us eternal riches. He wished to be poor during his whole life. Poor in his birth, he was born not in a palace, but in a cold stable; having only a manger for his cradle, and straw for his bed. Poor in his life, and poor in all things, he dwelt in a miserable hut containing but a single room which served for all the purposes of life. Poor in his garments and in his food. St. John Chrysostom says, that "the Redeemer and his disciples eat nothing but barley-bread;" and this may be inferred from the 6th chapter of St. John. Poor, in fine, in his death, leaving nothing behind him but his miserable garments; and these, even before his death, were divided among the soldiers. Thus, for his winding sheet and sepulchre, he depended on the bounty of the charitable.

6. Hence, Jesus once said to blessed Angela of Foligno: "If poverty were not a great blessing, I should not have chosen it for myself, nor should I have left it as an inheritance to my elect." It was because they saw Jesus poor the saints loved poverty so much. Father Granata and Father M. Avila discussed one day the reason why St. Francis of Assisium had such an affection for poverty. Father Granata maintained that it was because the saint wished to be freed from every impediment to a perfect union with God. But Father Avila asserted with more truth, that the ardent love of St. Francis for holy poverty arose from his ardent love of Jesus Christ. And surely a soul that loves Jesus Christ intensely, cannot but exclaim with the Apostle: "I count all things as dung, that I may gain Christ."—Phil. iii. 8. I esteem all the goods of the earth as dung, and therefore I despise them all that I may gain Jesus Christ. Hence, St. Francis de Sales used to say, that, "when a house is on fire, the furniture is thrown out through the windows;" and long before the Holy Ghost said: "If a man should give all the substance of his house for love, he shall despise it as nothing"—Cant. viii. 7. The ardent lover cheerfully despises all things through the love which he bears to God.

7. From the sacred Scriptures we learn that the reward of poverty is most certain, and great beyond measure. It is most certain, because Jesus Christ has said: "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven"—Matt. v. 3. To the other beatitudes heaven is promised only as a future reward. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall possess the land. Blessed are the clean of heart, for they shall see God"—Matt. v. 4, 8. But to the poor in spirit God's kingdom is promised as a present recompense: "for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Because to them who are truly poor in spirit the Lord gives very great helps even in this life. Hence, Cornelius a Lapide says, that since by the decree of God the kingdom of heaven belongs to the poor, they have a full right to it—In locum. citat. The reward of poverty is very secure, and great beyond conception. "The less we have here," says St. Teresa, "the more we shall enjoy in God's kingdom, where the mansion of each is proportioned to the love with which he shall have imitated the life of Jesus Christ"—Fondaz. cap. 18. "O happy commerce!" exclaims St. Chrysostom, "where clay is given away and gold received"—Lib. 7, epist. 7. O happy traffic! in which we renounce the goods of the earth, which are but mire, and receive in exchange the grace of God and eternal rewards, which are more precious than the purest gold.

8. The poor in spirit shall also have the honour of sitting with Jesus Christ as the judges of the world. "Behold," says St. Peter to Jesus, "we have left all things, and have followed thee: what, therefore, shall we have?" And Jesus said to them: "Amen, I say to you, that you who have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit on the seat of his majesty, you shall also sit on twelve seats, judging the twelve tribes of Israel"—Matt. xix. 27, 28. God has promised eternal glory hereafter, and a hundred fold in this life, to all who abandon earthly goods for his sake. "And every one that hath left house or lands for my name's sake, shall receive a hundred fold, and shall possess life everlasting"—Matt. xix. 29. This promise is fulfilled in all the poor in spirit who, because they desire nothing on earth, possess all riches: "As having nothing, and possessing all things"—2 Cor. vi. 10. The Redeemer has justly compared riches to thorns (Luke viii. 14,) for in proportion to their abundance riches torment the soul by cares, by fears, and by the desires of increased possessions. Hence, St. Bernard says, "that while the avaricious, because their desires of riches is never satiated, like mendicants, thirst after the goods of this world, the poor in spirit, because they wish for nothing upon earth, despise mammon." "The avaricious man, like a mendicant, hungers after earthly things; the poor man, like a lord, contemns them"—Ser. 2, in Cant. Oh! how great is the happiness of a religious, who desires and possesses nothing upon earth. She enjoys true peace, a blessing more valuable than all worldly goods, which can never content a soul destined to be made happy only by the possession of God.

9. Thus the poor in spirit receive a great reward in this, as well as in the next life. But where shall we find a religious truly poor in spirit? Let us examine in what true poverty of spirit consists. It consists, first, not only in the absence of all property, but also in the destruction of every desire which has not God for its object. "A pauper meets me," says St. Augustine, "and still I seek a man that is poor"—Ser. 110. de temp. Yes, in the world the number of the indigent is countless, but few of them are poor in spirit and desire. St. Teresa used to say, that "the religious who appears to be bereft of all property, but at the same time is not poor in spirit, deceives the world and herself." What will her actual poverty profit her? The poor, who desire the possession of riches, suffer indeed the pains of want, but do not practice the virtue of poverty. "He that desires the goods of the earth," says St. Philip Neri, "will never become a saint." You, dear sister, have abandoned the world; you have left all things, and will you, after so many sacrifices, expose yourself to the danger of being lost, or at least of not being a saint? Ah! be content with humble food and raiment: seek to become a saint, and do not, for miserable trifles, risk your eternal inheritence. "But," says the Apostle, "having food and wherewith to be covered, with these we are content. For they that will become rich fall into temptation, and into the snare of the devil, and into many unprofitable and hurtful desires, which draw men into destruction and perdition"—1 Tim. vi. 6, 8, 9. Whoever covets worldly riches shall fall into the snares of the enemy, and into numberless desires, which lead to death and to eternal misery.

10. Poverty of spirit consists, secondly, in keeping the heart detached, not only from what is valuable, but from what is trifling. The adhesion of the smallest portion of earth prevents the free ascent of a feather in the air; and the possession of a particle of worldly goods, in opposition to the perfection of poverty, impedes the perfect union of a religious with God, and the enjoyment of true peace. Thorns (or riches,) however small, torment the traveller, and diminish the expedition of his journey. To be perfect it is not necessary for a religious to abandon large possessions; no, it is sufficient to leave in effect and in affection the little which it is in her power to relinquish. St. Peter gave up little; but, because in affection he left all that he possessed (behold, we have left all things,) he merited to hear from Jesus Christ that he was chosen for one of the Redeemer's assessors at the general judgment. "You shall sit on twelve seats, judging the twelve tribes of Israel"—Matt. xix. 28. There are some religious who have an affection, not for precious stones, nor for vessels of gold, but for certain miserable trifles, such as some article of furniture, a book, or the like. They have not renounced all attachments to the goods of the earth, but have transferred their affections from things of value to trifles, and their solicitude about these trifles occasions as many imperfections and as much inquietude as the care of large possessions.

11. If seculars are lost, they are lost for the attainment of something great in the eyes of the world; "but what a pity," says Cassian, "to see a nun, after having left the world, and after having renounced her inheritance and liberty, lose the crown of a saint for trifles which are vile and miserable even in the estimation of worldlings." "The adversary," says St. Eucherius, "exults when he sees us, who contemned the most valuable goods, overcome in matters of the smallest importance"—Hom. ad Mon. What a source of triumph to the devil to find a person who has left considerable possessions shamefully conquered by the love of trifles. "Some," says Cassian, "who despise the most magnificent property, we see disturbed for a needle or a pen, and thus fall into the occasions of death"—Col. x. c. 6. St. Eucherius asserts what appears very extraordinary, that "the love of property, unless it be perfectly eradicated, is most ardent in small things"—Hom. 4 ad Mon. Most ardent, and therefore most criminal; for, by attachment to trifles, a religious shows a greater avidity for earthly goods than by an affection for what is valuable. Hence, Jesus Christ has said, "So likewise, everyone of you that doth not renounce all that he possesseth cannot be my disciple" —Luke xiv. 33.

12. Thirdly, poverty of spirit consists not only in being poor, but in loving poverty. "For," says St. Bernard, "it is not poverty, but the love of poverty, that is reputed virtue"—Ep. a Duc. Conrad. It is not the poor man, but the lover of poverty, that is esteemed virtuous. And to love poverty is to love the effects of poverty—that is hunger, cold, and above all, the contempt attendant upon want. For St. Thomas teaches, that "the honour of judging the world shall be given to the poor in spirit, as the reward of the humiliations occasioned by their indigence." "Many religious," says St. Vincent Ferrer, "glory in the name of poverty, but shun the sufferings and opprobrium which are its constant companions." "They glory in the name, but fly from the associates of poverty." St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say, that "he who feels not the inconveniences of want is not poor." And blessed Tolomea, a religious of the order of St. Clare, used to say, that "Angels and men will laugh at the religious who desires to be poor, and, at the same time, wishes to enjoy the advantages of wealth, or complains whenever she is deprived of them." But, my God, what is to be said of the poverty of the religious who, should her food be scanty or not well seasoned, breaks out into complaints? who, should she not be supplied with a new habit before the old one is torn, disturbs the whole community by her murmuring against the superior, and against those who hold office in the convent? What shall I say of the poverty of the nun who seeks finer cloth and linen than become her state? who is disquieted if her dress be not made in a neat and graceful form, so as to give her a genteel appearance? "They, indeed," says St. Bernard, "wish to be poor, but only on the condition that nothing may be wanting to them"—Ser. de ado. Dom.

PRAYER.

My Jesus, if hitherto my heart has been attached to the goods of the earth, thou shalt henceforth be my only treasure. O God of my soul! thou art a good, infinitely greater than any other; thou dost merit infinite love; I esteem and love thee above all things, and even more than myself; thou art the only object of all my affections. I desire nothing in this world. If I had any desires, it would be to possess all the treasures and kingdoms of the earth, for the purpose of renouncing them all, and depriving myself of them for the love of thee. Come O my love! come, and consume in me every affection which is not for thee. Grant that in future I may regard nothing but thee, think only of thee, and sigh only after thee. The love which made thee die on the cross for me makes me die to all my inclinations—makes me love only thy infinite goodness, and desire only thy grace and thy love. My dear Redeemer, when shall I be entirely thine, as thou art all mine? I am not able even to give myself to thee as I ought. Oh! take me and make me live only for thy glory. Trusting in the merits of thy blood, O Jesus, and in thy intercession, O my mother Mary, I hope for all things. Amen.

SECTION II.

On the degrees of the practice of perfect poverty.

1. The first degree of perfect religious poverty is not to possess anything as one's own. Hence, a religious should regard but as a loan whatever she possesses, and should be ready to give it up at the first inclination of the superior's will. She ought to be like a statue, which when dressed is not elated, and when stripped is not dejected. A sister who is afflicted at being deprived of anything by the superior shows that she did not retain it with the true spirit of poverty ; or at least that she had some attachment to it. A religious should remember that what she is permitted to retain belongs not to her, but is the property of the monastery. She should, therefore, hold it as a deposit, and ought not to expend it on vanity or in superfluous presents. Neither should she complain when the superior applies it to the use of the community, or any of the religious. What, then, are we to think of the nun who throws the whole convent into confusion whenever the sisters, with the permission of the superior, use what she possesses ? Search, then, O blessed sister, your heart, and see if it is detached from all you possess. Examine how you would feel if the superior refused to permit you to incur a certain expense, to retain a certain sum of money, or a certain piece of furniture? And if you feel an attachment for anything whatsoever, resolve, in imitation of that great servant of God, sister Mary of the Cross, either to deprive yourself of it, or to bring it to the superior, and leave it at her disposal. In a word, you must preserve the heart free from all affection, even for those things which you are permitted to retain.

2. The second degree of poverty is to deprive yourself of whatever is superfluous: for the smallest superfluity will prevent a perfect union of the soul with God. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi went so far as to strip her little altar of all its ornaments, except the crucifix. St. Teresa relates of herself, that, knowing God to be most jealous of religious poverty, she could not recollect herself in prayer as long as she retained anything which she thought to be superfluous. If, in your convent, there is not a perfect community of property, endeavour, at least, to imitate the poverty practiced by the most exemplary and exact among your companions, as well in dress as in food and furniture. But you will, perhaps, say that whatever you possess is retained with the leave of the superior. Permission to keep superfluities may save you from the punishments inflicted on proprietors, but will not secure to you the merit of perfect poverty. Again, you will, perhaps, say that you have no attachment to what you keep. But whether you have an attachment to it or not, the possession of what is not necessary will always prevent you from attaining the perfection of poverty. You may imagine that a certain sum of money, or a certain portion of property, will enable you to relieve the poor or to assist your companions. But, I repeat, that it is the nun who has nothing to give, and not the religious who has the means of distribiting alms, that edifies the Church. St. Thomas says, that "it is good to give your goods to the needy, but it is better to be poor with Christ" —2. 2. qu. 32, a. 8. It is meritorious to distribute your property to the poor, but it is better to be like Jesus Christ, without the means of giving alms. Besides, as the venerable sister Amadea used to say, "a good religious should desire to dispense only the goods which she receives from God, that is, good example, prayers, salutary advice, and the helps to spiritual life."

3. If, dear sister, you desire to please your spouse, you must renounce whatsoever you know to be superfluous. Should you be unable to ascertain what is absolutely necessary for your use, beg of the abbess to examine your cell, and to remove whatever is not indispensable. If you truly desire to be with Jesus Christ, I advise you not indeed to be singular, but not to allow any of your companions to surpass you in poverty. And that you may be among the poorest of your companions, you must endeavour to be poor in all things, in your dress, in your furniture, and in your food. With regard to clothes, be careful to practice the highest degree of poverty compatible with the usage of the community. Let your clothes be such as necessity requires, and not what vanity would suggest. Of what use are fine clothes to religious, except to gratify vanity, and to attract the notice and esteem of all who behold them? "For," says St. Gregory, "no one desires to be clothed in precious garments when he cannot be seen by others." But the Holy Ghost has declared that beauty does not consist in external decoration, but in interior comeliness. "All the glory of the king's daughter is within"—Ps. xliv. 14. On the contrary, "the exterior signs betray what is concealed within the soul"—Rev. S. Bridget, lib. 4, c. 13. Thus every vain ornament of dress shows that he who wears it is puffed up with vanity. Hence, St. Chrysostom says, that "a religious who attends to the decoration of her person, manifests the deformity of her soul." "Attention to the ornaments of the body indicates internal deformity"—Hom. 37.

St. Jerome observes, that "the soul is defiled in proportion as the body is adorned"—Serm. sup. Miss. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi (Vita, cap. 64,) saw many nuns in hell for violating poverty, and especially by vanity in dress.

4. I do not require of you to wear a torn or sordid dress: a torn garment is not decent in a religious; but a patched habit is suited to all who have made a vow of poverty: a sordid veil is not becoming, but an affected whiteness sought after by some is not proper. What edification is to be expected from the nun who wears wristbands of fine linen, fastened with silver buttons; who carries a costly ring on her finger, and beads of great value by her side; who uses only fine veils, and casts them aside as soon as the smallest break appears in them? She may be assured that her contempt of poverty is highly displeasing to God. To the venerable sister Constantia of the Conception Jesus once appeared, and, because she threw away a torn veil, said to her: "Is it thus you despise the badge of spouse which I gave you?" Religious who love Jesus Christ do not thus disregard holy poverty. When the venerable sister Margaret of the Cross, a daughter of Maximilian II. and a barefooted Clare, appeared before her brother Albert, the Archduke, in a patched habit, he was struck with astonishment, and expressed his surprise at seeing her dressed in such a manner. "Brother," replied the good religious, "I am more happy in these rags than all the monarchs of the earth are in their purple." What the world contemns is highly prized and rewarded by Almighty God. Violante Palombara, a noble lady, used only a garment of coarse linen, the poorest bedclothes, and a beads of plain wood. At the hour of death she exclaimed: "O what do I see? My dress resplendent with rays!—my covering made of gold!—and my beads of diamonds!"

5. You must also take care to practice poverty in the furniture of your cell. In the chronicles of St. Jerome we read that when superiors found curiosities in the convent they immediately cast them into the fire, calling them "idols of religious." The great servant of God, sister Mary Magdalene Carafa, who had been duchess of Andria, and aftewards a religious in the Sapienza of Naples, would not keep in her cell paintings or presents, or even many books. "For reading," she would say, "a single book is sufficient, and contains more than we can put in practice." Her conduct should cover with confusion certain religious, who keep in their cells a great number of spiritual books, but do not practice the lessons which they read in any of them. St. Teresa examined, every day, whether there was any superfluity in her cell; if she found any she immediately removed it. What profit do religious draw from paintings which are not sacred, from gilded cornices, or splendid chests? Ornaments of silver and crystals are better suited to a lady in the world than to a nun in the cloister. Remember that what now pleases the eyes shall, at the hour of death, torture the soul, and in another life shall be severely punished, at least in purgatory. The learned Palifox relates, that a superior once appeared to a religious, and told him that, with regard to the vow of poverty, God demands a most rigorous account of certain things which are not attended to in this life. He also said that he himself suffered severely in purgatory for having kept in his cell some desks of nut-tree. Some religious must have in their cells a supply of fruits, spices, and other eatables. When the physician prescribed for the venerable mother Mary John of the Annunciation a conserve of roses, she refused to keep any of it in the cell, but made a sister bring her, every evening, as much as was necessary for the night.

6. Above all, seek to be poor in money. St. Paul compares avarice to idolatry. "No covetous person (which is a serving of idols) hath inheritance in the kingdom of Christ"—Eph. v. 5. The comparison is most just; for the avaricious man desires money as his last end, and thus makes it his god. Hence, St. Chrysostom said, "Let us contemn money, lest we be contemned by Christ"—Hom. 7, in c. 3, ad Rom. If we wish not to be despised by Jesus Christ, we must despise riches. Hence, the first Christians, after having sold their goods, placed the price at the feet of the apostles (Acts iv. 34 and 35,) "thus showing," as Jerome says, "that money should not find a place in the heart of man, but should be trampled under his feet." Some religious, under the pretext of providing for their necessities, desire the possession of riches. St. Catherine of Sienna used to say: "We desire to abound in temporal goods, because as long as we do not possess them in abundance, we imagine that we stand in need of them." But religious who love perfection seek not after riches; they desire only what is absolutely indispensable; and, therefore, they look for scarcely as much as is necessary for their support. By enabling them to indulge every whim and caprice, a superfluous income serves only to make religious more proud, more at ease, more vain, and less mortified. "What a shame," says St. Catherine of Sienna (Epis. 15,) "to see some religious, who should be mirrors of poverty, enjoy more pleasures in the cloister than they would had they remained in the world!" Surely it is a scandalous irregularity in a nun to seek more indulgence in religion than she should obtain in the world.

7. If you wish not to offend against poverty, you must observe great caution in your whole expenditure. There are some, and particularly in our own time, since the expenses of religious have become extravagant, who boast of their splendour and generosity, saying—while we have the means we must spend. Such language might be expected from a worldling, but should never be uttered by a religious. Nor is it any justification to say that the expenses are incurred for God's honour, on the solemn festivals of the monastery. Clement the Fifth prohibited to religious all superfluous expenditure, even on the divine worship—Clementine, xxvii. § rursus de verb. signif. Hence, St. Charles Borromeo ordained that, on the festivals of nuns, the decorations should be decent, but not sumptuous. What, think you, says St. Bernard, "Is it penance, compunction, or the admiration of the bystanders, that is sought in these things?"—Ser. ad Guliel. Do you think that a religious in the sumptuous celebration of a feast, seeks the honour of God by inspiring others with devotion, or rather the indulgence of her own vanity, by exciting admiration of her generosity and splendour? But you will, perhaps, say, that bishops incur great expenses in the celebration of festivals. In the words of St. Bernard, who has proposed and answered this objection, I reply that "the condition of bishops is different from that of religious, We," says the Saint, "have left all that is precious in the world, and by this means we intended to excite devotion." The circumstances of bishops, and of religious who make a profession of poverty, are very different: the latter have left the world: even in their festivals they should appear poor, and by their exterior poverty should endeavour to excite devotion in others. Oh! how many faults are committed by religious in celebrating their feasts. They are not content with a great abundance of lights and of ornaments, or with the expense of music: no: they must also display their vanity by regaling all who are invited to the solemnity.

8. But you will say: what am I to do? others act in this manner; shall I not be like them? If you must be like others, you ought at least not to endeavour to surpass them, nor increase the excesses which have been already introduced. If you indulge in any excess, the sister who will have to celebrate the next feast will strive to equal you in pomp and splendour. The abuses which already exist are more than sufficient. Do not, then, I repeat, introduce any new one: if you do, you shall have to render a frightful account to God. For it is by repeated acts of extravagance that the habit of lavish expenditure is established. One exceeds her companions in magnificence and liberality; she is surpassed by another, and thus a great degree of extravagance is gradually introduced. It is in this manner that many communities have lost the spirit of fervour, and have fallen away from the habit of regular observance. How many nuns are there who, on account of their extravagant expenditure, lead a life of continual distraction and inquietude, without recollection or devotion, and full of faults and vanities! The Sovereign Pontiff and the sacred congregations have frequently endeavoured to correct this evil; but their exertions have, in a great measure, proved abortive. On this subject I have nothing more to say, except to exclaim: Woe to the nun who introduces abuses and vanities into religion! The sister who is charged with the management of the affairs of the convent should be careful not to expend extravagant sums for her own convenience. By her prodigality she might be guilty of a grevious transgression of the vow of poverty. Let all remember that permissions to lay out money are not to be obtained from the confessor, but from the superior. For in temporals all the religious are bound to obey her. To lay out money on any object different from that on which you obtained permission to expend it is a violation of poverty. Let it also be remembered that to make presents, without just reason, and only through caprice or vanity, to persons who do not stand in need of them, is also an offence against poverty. "It is a sacrilege to give the property of the poor to them who are not poor"—Ep. ad Pamach. It is a sacrilegious violation of poverty to give the goods of the poor, that is of religious, who have nothing of their own, to them who are not in want. The decrees of the Sovereign Pontiffs forbid confessors to receive presents from nuns: such presents, when mutual, are particularly prohibited. "Holy love," says St. Jerome, "does not make frequent little presents, nor indulge in affectionate letters"—Ep. ad Nepot.

9. The third degree of poverty requires that you do not complain when you are in want even of necessaries. The Mother of God once said to one of her devout servants, a Franciscan nun: "My child, as long as all your wants are supplied you are not poor: true poverty consists in having less than is necessary." "To complain of poverty," says St. Jane Chantal, "is displeasing to God and to men. I never feel so happy as when I bear some of the marks of poverty." That great servant of God, D. Baptista Vernassa, a canoness regular, used to say, that she experienced great pleasure in reflecting that she had no provision for any future necessity. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi was afflicted at seeing her wants supplied by the abbess. She once felt so much complacency in not having bread at table that she afterwards accused herself of having entertained too much pleasure in the privation. Sometimes she exclaimed: "Oh! how happy should I be, if I went to table and found no food, if I went to sleep and found no bed, if I went to dress and had no clothes. O! that all things were wanting to me." Tell me, dear sister, do you practice such perfect poverty? Although you may have renounced all affection to the world, and to vain and superfluous possessions, you are perhaps still attached to what you regard as necessary; and still anxious to be furnished with decent and comfortable clothes, food, and bed. It is this solicitude about them that disturbs you whenever they are wanting to you.

10. But in what way do you wish to be poor? Do you expect to enjoy the reward of poverty, and at the same time to want nothing? Would you not be in want of many necessaries had you remained in the world? And do you seek to be supplied with all necessaries in religion, which you embraced for the purpose of suffering, and in which you had a solemn vow of poverty? "To desire to be poor," says St. Francis de Sales, "and not to feel any of the inconveniences of want, is to wish for the honour of poverty and the advantages of riches." But you will say, had I good health, I would cheerfully suffer all things; but I am weak and infirm, and therefore I cannot bear to see the superior as forgetful of me as if I were in good health. You complain that others are unmindful of you, and you yourself forget that you have entered religion for the purpose of suffering. A nun should embrace sufferings in sickness as well as in health. In the constitutions of the Teresians, the following admonition is given: "Our sick brethren, if anything be wanting in them, should remember that they have embraced the poverty of Jesus Christ, and therefore neither in sickness nor in health, should desire to be treated like the rich." St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi gives a very excellent advice on this subject: "However great your infirmities," says the saint, "never take and never seek what savours not of poverty." Hence, St. Bernard says, that "it is not becoming in poor religious to make use of costly remedies," and therefore he recommended his monks "not to take any other medicine than decoctions of herbs." Had you remained in the world you would not, perhaps, be able to procure the medicine and the attendance of physicians, with which you are provided in religion; and still you seek for other remedies. Ah! be content, not only to live but to die in poverty; and rejoice that death, when it shall come to take you out of this life, will find you treated as a pauper. On every occasion in which you shall have to suffer from want, have before your eyes the beautiful sentiment of St. Jane Chantal, who was accustomed to say, that "as the opportunities of practicing poverty are so rare, we should, whenever they occur, accept them with gladness."

11. The fourth and last degree of poverty requires not only that a religious be content with what is poor, but also that she prefer and select what is poorest; the poorest cell, the poorest bed, the poorest clothes, and the poorest food. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi rejoiced in eating what was left by the other sisters. Her habit was so threadbare that the superior obliged her to change it. St. Jane Chantal used to say, that for the perfection of poverty, it is advisable not to use silver when tin is sufficient, nor tin when lead answers the purpose. The nun who wishes to be a saint observes a similar rule in all other things.

12. It will be useful to insert in this place the beautiful instruction of D. Anthony Torres to a nun who was one of his penitents: "Since your spouse esteemed poverty so highly, you shall love it as a treasure; you shall practice it in all things, and glory in it more than in the most splendid ornaments. Do not allow any nun or lay sister in the convent to be poorer than you. You shall wear no ornaments, and no more clothes than are absolutely necessary; you must practice poverty, even in your veil, which should be coarse and patched, and even in the beads which hang by your side. You shall delight in wearing a poor patched-up habit, and shall not cast it aside until it is no longer fit for use. Abstain as much as possible from keeping two habits, or more linen than the meanest of the lay sisters. Do not possess or seek anything, however necessary it may appear, without first looking at your naked spouse on the cross, and asking his permission. Neither give nor receive any presents, however small, without the superior's leave. In your cell, you shall have only a poor bed, the coarsest bedclothes, two chairs of straw, a crucifix, four unframed pictures, the few books which your director will prescribe for your use, and whatever else is indispensably necessary. You shall frequently examine before the crucifix your conduct with regard to the virtue of poverty; and if you find that you possess any superfluity you shall bring it immediately to the superior. Never ask from your relatives any thing for your own use: you may ask something from them for the community, but never reserve anything whatsoever for yourself"—Vita, lib. 2, c. 11.

13. Ah! blessed sister, after having renounced the world and all its goods, do not, I pray you, prefer emptiness and nothingness before the Lord. When, to induce St. Clement, Bishop of Ancyra, to deny Jesus Christ, the Emperor Diocletian offered him silver, gold, and precious stones, the saint heaved a deep sigh of sorrow at seeing his God compared with dross. And when, on the condition of renouncing Christianity, the dignity of first pontiff and head of the priesthood was offered to St. Basil, Martyr, by the tribune, on the part of the Emperor Licinius, the saint replied: "Tell the emperor, that though he made me master of all his dominions, he could not give me as much as he would take from me, by robbing me of my God, to make me a slave of the devil." And, dearest sister, since you have left all things for God, do not, for the sake of any miserable earthly good, expose your soul to the danger of eternal perdition. Imagine that God places before you himself on the one hand, and creatures on the other, and that he speaks to you in the language which he once addressed to the venerable Mary crucified: "Choose between me and creatures, whichsoever will make you happy"—Vita, lib. 1, c. 19. A religious should have no treasure but God. I conclude in the words of St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi: "O happy the religious who, detached from all things by means of holy poverty, can say, 'The Lord is the portion of my inheritance.'" God alone is the portion which I desire, in time as well as in eternity. Hence, the saint was heard to exclaim: "Nothing, nothing but God; I desire to possess him only, for his own sake."

PRAYER.

My Jesus, in thee I find all these things; out of thee I desire nothing. Ah! draw me entirely to thee; enkindle in my heart thy holy love, by which I desire to see myself entirely consumed. My dear Redeemer, I know that thou hast been near to me for so many years, because thou dost wish me to belong entirely to thee. Since, then, thou dost so ardently desire my welfare, grant that henceforth I may seek only thy love and the fulfilment of thy holy will. Ah! Lord, deliver me from all affections which remove me from thee. Grant that my thoughts may be wholly employed in endeavouring to avoid every offence against thy majesty, and in seeking to please thee to the best of my power. O incarnate Word! thou art come upon earth to kindle the flames of love in the hearts of men. Oh, take possession of my heart; fill it with thy love; enlighten it, and make it ready and willing to execute all thy holy desires. In a word, unite my soul perfectly with thy divinity, and possess it entirely and forever. Unite thyself to me, and me to thee, by a perfect love, which shall never be dissolved. Grant that I may be no longer mine own, but that I may be thine entirely and forever, my treasure, my love, and my only good. Mary, my mother, in thy intercession my hopes are placed. Amen.

CHAPTER X.

ON DETACHMENT FROM PERSONS.

SECTION I.

On detachment from Relatives.

1. If attachment to relatives were not productive of great mischief Jesus Christ would not have so strenuously exhorted us to estrangement from them. "If," he says, "any man come to Me, and hate not his father and mother * * * * and brethren and sisters, he cannot be My disciple"—Luke xiv. 26. And again: "I came to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother"—Luke x. 35. But why does the Redeemer insist so strongly on alienation from relatives? Why does he take so much pains to separate us from them? He himself assigns the reason: it is because "a man's enemies shall be they of his household"—Matt. x. 36. Relatives are the worst enemies of the sanctification of Christians, and particularly of religious; because they are, according to St. Thomas, the greatest obstacle to advancement in virtue. "Frequently," says the holy doctor, "carnal friends oppose the progress of the spirit; for in the affair of salvation the nearest akin are not friends but enemies"—2. 2. q. 189, a. 10. The truth of this assertion is fully established by experience. Even St. Charles Borromeo, notwithstanding his great reserve and perfect detachment from relatives, acknowledged that after returning from among them he felt his soul tepid and detached from the things of God. Hence, according to all the masters of spiritual life, he who desires to walk in the way of perfection must fly from relatives, must abstain from taking part in their affairs, and when they are at a distance must not even inquire about them.

2. What progress can be expected from the religious who wishes to have her relatives near the convent, who, if she do not see them, is constantly sending letters and messages to request a visit from them; and who, if they yielded not to her entreaties, is disturbed, and complains by frequent letters of their absence and neglect? It is impossible for a nun of this description ever to attain a close union with God. "Whoever," says St. Gregory, "wishes to be truly united to the Father of all must be separated from relatives"—Mor. Lib. 7. cap. 6. Whoever aspires to a union with God, the common Father of all men, must fly altogether from his kindred. When the Blessed Virgin lost the infant Jesus she sought him in vain for three days among her kinsfolk. "Yes," says St. Bernard, "Jesus is not found among kinsfolk." Peter Blessensis asserts that the love of flesh and blood soon robs the soul of the love of God. "Carnal love will soon remove you from the love of God." Religious should regard the dying words of Moses as peculiarly applicable to themselves: "Who hath said to his father and to his mother, I do not know you; and to his brethren, I know you not. These have kept thy word and observed thy covenant"—Deut. xxxiii. 9. The religious who tells her parents, and her brothers, and her sisters, that she knows them not, is the true spouse of Jesus. She is the king's daughter who obeys the call of God, and fulfils the covenant made with him at her profession, when he spoke to her in the language which he addresses to every soul consecrated to his love: "Hearken, O daughter, and see, and incline thine ear, and forget thy people and thy father's house. And the king shall greatly desire thy beauty"—Ps. xliv. 18. Hear my voice, O daughter, and learn to understand the great blessings which you shall receive if you observe my commandments. Open then your ear to my words: forget your kindred and your father's house, and I, your king and spouse, shall love your beauty. "It is," says St. Jerome, "a great advantage to forget your parents; for then 'the King shall greatly desire your beauty'"—In reg. mon. Great shall be your reward; you shall become dear to the Lord, who will make you happy here and hereafter. Such is the recompense promised by the Redeemer when he said: "And every one that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother . . . . for my name's sake, shall receive an hundred-fold, and shall possess life everlasting"—Matt. xix. 29. The nun who leaves her relatives in effect and in affection, shall obtain eternal beatitude in heaven, and a hundred-fold on earth: she will leave a few, and shall find many sisters in religion; she will abandon a father and a mother, and in return shall have God for her Father, and Mary for her mother; and from them she shall experience the kindness and affection of the fondest parent.

3. Hence, convinced that detachment from kindred is highly pleasing to God, the saints have sought to be wholly removed from their relations. St. Francis Xavier, when about to set out on the Indian mission, refused to visit his mother or relatives, though they repeatedly requested a visit from him, although he passed near their residence, and although he knew that he should never see them again. When his sister came to see St. Pachomius, he sent her the following message: "It is enough for you to have learned that I am alive; go, then, in peace." Some of the saints have gone so far as to abstain from reading the letters of their dearest friends. St. John Climacus relates, that St. Anthony, after having spent several years in the desert, on receiving some letters from his relatives, said to himself: "What can I expect from the perusal of these letters but disturbance of mind, and the loss of that peace which I enjoy?" The holy man then cast them into the fire, saying: "Begone from me all thoughts of my country, that I may not return to the things which I have already left. To the flames, ye letters, that I may not be one day burned by you."

4. "For my part," says St. Teresa, "I cannot conceive what consolation a nun can find in her relatives. By attachment to them she displeases God, and without being able to enjoy their amusements, she shares in all their troubles." How applicable to you, O blessed sister, is this reflection of the saint? When your parents and friends come to the grate they certainly cannot make you a partaker of their worldly amusements; for you cannot go beyond the limits of the enclosure. In their visits, then, they only recount their misfortunes, their infirmities, and their wants. Surely such narratives only serve to fill your head and heart with so much inquietude, with so many distractions and defects, that after each visit you shall be for several days disturbed and distracted in your meditations and communions, by the remembrances of what you have heard. How is it possible that you who have left the world can so ardently desire the frequent visits of your relatives? Is it that they may frequently rob you of your peace and of the progress you have made? Oh! what an excess of folly to imagine that you cannot be happy without frequently seeing your friends! Ah! if you keep aloof from them, what torrents of consolation and happiness would your spouse, Jesus, infuse into your soul! St.

Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, "that an abhorrence of the grates should be the principal fruit of the communions of religious. And as an evil spirit once said to the venerable sister Mary Villani, "there is certainly no place where the devil does so much injury to religious as in the parlour." Hence St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi would not even pass through it, and so much was her hatred of it, that she could not bear to hear it mentioned. Whenever she was obliged to go to the parlour she would begin to weep, and would say to her novices: "My dear children, pray to God for me, for I am called to the grate." When leaving them she would beg of them soon to call her away from the grate.

5. But you will say, what am I to do? Am I never to see my friends? When they visit me must I send them away and refuse to go to the grate? I do not require so much from you, but if you refuse to see them would you do wrong? would you do what would be inconvenient, or what is never done by religious? Several nuns have resolved never to see their relatives, and have fulfilled their resolution. In the life of Father Torres (lib. 6, cap. 1,) it is related of Gerolama Sanfelice, a religious in the convent of St. Alvina, that so great was her attachment to her relations, that her thoughts were continually upon them; that she desired frequent visits from them, and sent every day to inquire about her father. Her sister, Mary Antonia, who lived in the same convent, was so fervent, that she besought the Lord to make her suffer a great deal in this life. Her prayer was heard, and she was afflicted with an ulcer, which eat away her flesh, and produced the very pangs of death. In her agony she would exclaim: "More suffering, O my spouse, more suffering." When dying she said to Gerolama, that "she hoped to obtain eternal glory, and that as soon as she should enter into bliss she would beg of God to transform her tepid sister into a saint." She died; Gerolama changed her life, and adopted and observed for forty years the resolution never more to see her relations. It once happened that two of her nephews came to visit her, but she refused to see them, and having sent them away, she went to the grate of the church to pray before the blessed sacrament. The young men entered the church, expecting to see her at a distance, but she instantly retired behind the curtain, and such was the effort which she made on that occasion to stifle the feelings of flesh and blood, that she fainted away. Whoever does not offer violence to herself shall never become a saint. Sister Gerolama made rapid progress in divine love, and afterwards lived and died a saint. After death her body was opened, and a cross of flesh was found on her heart, as a token of the great love which she had borne to Jesus crucified. Why cannot you imitate her example, and free yourself forever from the distractions of grates?

6. But you will say that the abbess or the confessor will not permit you to observe such a resolution. On what grounds can they refuse you permission? Is not such a resolution the fruit of a divine inspiration? and if practiced would it not be a source of great edification to the other sisters? Would it not, at least, make them see the impropriety and the dangers of attachments to their relations and to the grate? But should the superior command you to see your relatives, I tell you to obey; but at the same time I entreat you to imitate the example of blessed Theodore, who, when commanded to converse with his mother, who had come to see him, said to the abbot: "Father, you command me to speak with my mother, but do you assure me that from the conversation I shall suffer no spiritual injury?" Afraid of the consequence, the abbot released the brother from the obligation which he had imposed upon him. It may be useful to remind abbesses and confessors that if, without just cause, and only through caprice, or unreasonable human respect, or self-interest, or to avoid trouble, they hinder the greater progress of a religious who seeks to run to God, they will certainly have to render to the Lord an account of their conduct. As to you, O blessed sister, when they oblige you to see your relations, obey; again I say, that I do not want of you never more to see your friends; but whenever necessity compels you to speak with them, I exhort you to observe the following rules; first, before you go to the grate recommend yourself to Jesus in the holy sacrament or on the cross, and beg that he may assist you, and preserve you from every defect in your conversation. Secondly, take care not to imitate the religious who go to the parlour to amuse themselves, or to learn what passes in the world, and afterwards tell it to the whole community. Thirdly, be careful not to make known to externs the internal concerns of the convent, and particularly what might tend to the discredit of the superior or the sisters. Fourthly, should externs begin to speak on useless or worldly matters, such as marriages, balls, or fond attachments, break off, break off at once the conversation, and introduce some Christian maxim, or some fact from which you can draw a spiritual sentiment. You are not to learn the language of seculars, but should teach them the language of religious, whose conversation should be always on the things of God. Time spent at the grate is not profitable to the soul; it is all lost, and for it you shall one day have to render an account to God. Fifthly, never seek a visit from your relations. When they come endeavor to withdraw from them as soon as possible; excuse your withdrawal by saying that you must attend to the duties of your office; that you must assist a person who is sick, or by some similar apology. Whoever wishes easily finds very just reasons for taking leave of visitors. If you act in this manner they will soon feel that their conversation is not very pleasing to you, and will come less frequently to disturb you. And be assured that the shorter their visits, the fewer will be your defects; and that the seldomer you see them, the more you will be recollected, and the greater will be the consolations which you shall receive from Jesus Christ. The venerable sister Catherine, a Cistercian, because she became a nun against the consent of her parents, was altogther abandoned by them; but such was the joy which her spouse poured into her soul, that she was accustomed to say: "I do not envy my sisters, who are visited very frequently in the year by their parents, because, as often as I wish I go to my true Father, Jesus, and to my dear mother, Mary, and they fill me with consolations."

7. Lastly, take care above all things not to implicate yourself in the temporal concerns of your relatives: such as marriages, contracts, expenses, or any similar affairs. If you do you shall lose all peace and recollection, and perhaps your immortal soul. "How many monks," says St. Jerome, "by compassion towards their father and mother have lost their own souls?"—In Men. How many religious, by compassion for their relatives, have been lost? In another place the Saint says, that the more tender the affection of a religious for her kindred, the greater her impiety towards God. "Great piety towards relatives is impiety towards God"—Epist. 28, ad Paulm. And what greater impiety than that a nun should, for the service of her family, give up the service of God, neglect mental prayer, the sacraments, and expose herself to all the distractions which necessarily arise from care of worldly affairs. St. Bernard exhorts his religious "to fly from such cares, as being diabolical"—In cons. mon. cap. 23. St. Ignatius of Loyola refused to interfere in the marriage of one of his nieces, though she was the heiress of the family. St. Francis Borgia would not ask the Pope for a dispensation (which he would have easily obtained,) to have his son married to a relative, although the acquisition of a large estate depended on the marriage.—Vita, lib. 4, cap. 6. "No man," said the Redeemer, "putting his hand to the plough and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God"—Luke ix. 62.

8. Let us tremble, for God himself has declared that he who has begun to serve the Lord, and looks back to the things of the world, is unfit for paradise. When, then, relatives seek to implicate you in worldly affairs, withdraw at once from them. Attend to the advice of the Redeemer to the young man, who, when asked to follow Jesus, answered, that he wished first to bury his father: "Let the dead," says Jesus, "bury the dead"—Luke ix. 60. Leave, then, O blessed sister, worldlings (who are said to be dead) to attend to their worldly business, and let it be your sole care and concern to love God, and to become a saint. Tell your parents that worldly business is not fit for you, nor suited to your state. When his mother said to Jesus: "Son, why hast thou done so to us? Behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing," he replied: "Did you not know that I must be about my Father's business?"—Luke ii. 48, 49. Did you not know that I should attend only to the interests of my Father's glory? Should your relatives complain of your unwillingness to serve them, should they even charge you with disaffection, with ingratitude, and even call you the enemy of your family, answer then with firmness, that you are dead to the world, and that it is your duty to attend only to the service of God and of the monastery. I conclude this chapter with the words of St. Joseph Calasanctius: "A religious who is attached to her relations has not as yet left the world."

PRAYER.

O my God and my spouse, thee alone I desire to serve and to love henceforth and forever. I desire to serve creatures only when I know that thou dost wish me to serve them. Ah! Lord, make thy will known to me; I wish to do it in all things. Ah! inflame my whole soul with thy holy love, that for the future I may seek only thy will. Grant that nothing may please me but what pleases thee. Grant that I may always say with sincerity: "My God and my spouse, I desire thee only, and nothing more." O my King and my spouse, Jesus, reign alone in my whole soul; possess it without reserve; let thy love command and point out what I am to do, what I am to avoid, and what I am to desire; and let my soul obey only thy will. Ah! my dear Redeemer, through the merits of thy passion hear my prayer. Oh, Queen of heaven, in thee I trust: assist me by thy intercession. Amen.

SECTION II.

On detachment from seculars and even from the sisters.

1. St. Augustine says, that whoever shuns not dangerous conversations will soon fall into a precipice: "He that will not avoid suspected familiarity soon falls into ruin"—Serm. 2, in Don. 29. The example of the unhappy Solomon should make us all tremble. At first he was most dear to God, and even the inspired of the Holy Ghost, but by the love of strange women he was, in his old age, led into idolatry—Kings iii. 11. Nor should his fall be a subject of wonder; "for," as St. Cyprian says, "to stand in the midst of flames and not to burn is impossible." Be assured, O blessed spouse of the Lord, that for religious the atmosphere of the parlour, where conversations are held with seculars, is pestiferous. As in the choir religious breathe the salubrious air of paradise, so in the parlour they may inhale the pestilential vapours of hell. A religious, were she in her father's house, would certainly not dare to spend an hour or two in conversation with persons of every age and sex: and will she not scruple to do it in God's own dwelling? Is the house of the Lord to be treated with less respect than the house of a secular? But you will say: by the grace of God such conversations are harmless. Let them who speak thus remember that all friendships founded on a sensible affection for external objects, if not productive of other evils, are at least great obstacles to perfection. They certainly destroy the spirit of prayer and recollection; and the nun who entertains such friendships will be in the Church in body, but her thoughts will be fixed on her friends. Such friendships serve to weaken her affection for the sacraments, and to conceal from herself and others the source of her tepidity; and thus she daily becomes more imperfect. She loses her peace; for should anything be said against those for whom she has conceived a regard, or whose conversation she seeks to enjoy, she is at once disturbed, and censures the person by whose language she is offended. She loses obedience; for when admonished by the superior to break off such friendships she excuses herself by various pretenses, but does not obey. In fine, she loses the love of God, who desires to possess her whole heart, who will not suffer any affection which is not for him; and therefore seeing her soul attached to others, he withdraws himself, and deprives her of his special assistance. The venerable sister Frances Farnese used to say to to the religious under her care: "We are shut up in this monastery that we may neither see nor be seen, but that we may preserve our souls spotless before God. The more we hide ourselves from seculars, the more God will manifest himself to us by his grace in this life, and by his glory in the next."

2. Affections which arise from certain external qualifications, possessed by persons of a different sex, not only deprive the soul of great advantages, but also expose her to very great danger. In the beginning they appear indifferent, but by degrees they become sinful, and finally lead the soul into some mortal transgression. St. Teresa (Vita, cap. 30) was once shown the place prepared for her in hell, had she not renounced a certain inordinate, though not impure, affection for a relative.

3. If, dear reader, you ever feel an attachment of this kind, your only remedy is a resolute and total retreat from the object of your affection. If you seek to withdraw by degrees, believe me your efforts will be fruitless; such chains, because they are strong, are burst only with difficulty, without a sudden and violent effort their bondage shall never be dissolved. You will, perhaps, say that no impropriety can occur. Remember that the devil never commences by suggesting the worst of evils, but by degrees he leads negligent souls to the brink of ruin, and then by an easy effort casts them into the precipice. It is a common maxim of masters of spiritual life, that the only remedy is flight and the removal of occasions. St. Philip Neri used to say that "in this warfare only cowards, that is they who fly from the occasions of defeat, shall be conquerors."

4. Although you have been free from such affections, you must still guard yourself against them with all possible care; for you, too, are exposed to the danger of being caught in the snare into which, through their own negligence, others have fallen. To preserve your soul free from every dangerous attachment, I advise you, in the language of St. Teresa, first, to prize yourself more for plainness than for the elegance of your manners, the agreeableness of your conversation, or the facility of paying compliments to seculars. "With externs," says St. Catherine of Sienna, in a letter to her niece, "you should be modest; your head should be bowed down, and your manner and conversation simple and unaffected." At the grate be careful to abstain from unguarded looks and indecent laughter, and never appear in a habit affectedly neat. It would be still a greater fault to go to the grate with any badge of worldly pomp or vanity. In a word, if you expect to escape every danger, remove yourself as much as possible from all conversation with seculars. "Sit solitary," says St. Bernard, "as the turtle; have nothing to do with crowds"—Serm. in Cant. Remain in solitude; love the choir and the cell, and shun the parlour as the abode of pestilence. To consecrate your whole being to God you have left the world; what then have you to do with seculars? "If," says the venerable sister Jane, of the order of St. Francis, "you are the spouse of the King of kings, turn not your eyes to slaves." It is a crime in a slave to fix his eyes on the king's spouse, and should the queen take complacency in his attention to her, she would be guilty of a similar transgression. Speaking of nuns, St. Catherine of Sienna says, "We shall not be spouses, but sacrilegious violators of our engagements, if we seek for happiness in the gratification of self-love; if we hate the cell, and love the society of seculars"—Ep. 158. Should you, in conversation, ever feel a disorderly affection, stifle it at once, before it acquires the strength of a giant. "While," says St. Jerome, "the enemy is small, destroy him"—Epist. 22. To kill a lion when young is an easy task; but to conquer him when he has attained maturity is a work of extreme and insuperable difficulty.

5. It would be still more criminal and disgraceful to permit any secular to indulge in indecent jests. Should any worldling carry his sacrilegious insolence so far as to utter such jests in your presence, imagine not that, because you only listen, you are blameless. By not retiring at once, you co-operate with him, and render yourself a partaker of his guilt. Because, should you not instantly withdraw from such infernal conversation, you will soon become more criminal than its author; and from the dignity of the spouse of Jesus you will fall to the degraded condition of the slave of Satan.

6. With the ecclesiastics who visit you, not for the purpose of speaking of God nor for your spiritual good, but for the pleasure of your society, you should be reserved. I would recommend you to speak with your confessor only in the tribunal of penance. I advise you to abstain as much as possible from all correspondence with him by little presents, or by any similar means. "Oh!" says St. Teresa, "what obstacles does such worldly correspondence present to the spiritual progress of religious." Should there be an ancient custom in your convent of making presents to the confessor, it will be enough for you to send him two or three times a year some trifle as a mark of attention.

7. Even in our intercourse with persons of great sanctity caution is necessary. "Nor," says St. Thomas, "are they to be less avoided because they are more holy: for the greater their sancity the more they excite sentiments of affection"—Opus. 64, de Mod. conf. perif. The venerable Father Sertorio Caputo, of the Society of Jesus, says "the devil first makes us love a man's virtue, then his person, and at length draws us into the precipice." St. Thomas teaches that the devil at first kindles an attachment which only slightly wounds the soul; but what appeared to be pure angelic love soon degenerates into the human affection of beings clothed with flesh. Looks and words of tenderness follow: these are succeeded by a desire of each other's society: thus by degrees a holy attachment will be converted into a mutual affection. Such the doctrine of St. Thomas.

8. St. Bonaventure gives fives marks by which we may ascertain whether a mutual attachment between two friends is pure or otherwise. It is not pure when it leads to long and useless discourses: and when conversations are very long they are always useless. 2. When each delights in looking at and in praising the other. 3. When either excuses the other's defects. 4. When they manifest certain little jealousies. 5. When either feels unhappy at being separated from the other. The attachment is not pure when personal beauty or gracefulness is a source of pleasure: when either desires to be esteemed by the other, or when either is unwilling that his friend should receive attention from others. Father Peter Consoline has justly remarked that we should treat with holy persons of a different sex as with the souls in purgatory, that is, at a distance, and without looking at them. Some religious have a strong desire of conversing with their spiritual father, because they imagine that his instructions will stimulate their fervour. But what need is there of such conversations, of long and familiar discourses? Have they not an abundant supply of spiritual books? Have they not lectures at table and at prayer? Have they not the benefit of sermons in the church? Without any of these, the reading and observance of their rules and constitutions ought to be sufficient to make them saints.

9. It is necessary to remark that even among the religious themselves, inordinate attachments may be found. "Young man," says St. Basil, "avoid familiarity with your equals: how many young persons has the devil, through companions, drawn into hell, to burn in eternal fire?"—Ser. de abdic. rer. etc. "Many of them," continues the saint,

"were, in the beginning, enticed into a certain attachment which appeared to be charity, but which afterwards led to the loss of peace and of the perfection of their state." "Love," says Blessed Angela of Foligno, "includes every evil as well as every good." I do not speak of criminal love, which every one knows should be avoided, but of the love which friend entertains for friend, and which may degenerate into an irregular affection. Frequent conversations, along with the manifestation of mutual regard, produce too close an union of hearts, render friendship noxious, and by strengthening attachment obscure the light of reason. Each yields to the will of the other, and thus both are led into the neglect of duty."—Vita, p. 2, c. 1.

10. St. Basil prescribed a very severe chastisement for the nuns of his order who should entertain particular friendships. St. Bernard calls such friendships "poisoned attachments, and the enemies of the peace of communities." They are a source of disturbance, of murmurings, of irregularities, of factions and of parties, and sometimes they influence the votes at election to office in favour, not of the most worthy, but of the greatest favourites. Let it be your study to love all, and to serve all so that each will regard you as a friend. But abstain from familiarity with any: let your intimacy be only with God. Be particularly careful to avoid familiarity with all who manifest attachment to you. The way through which you walk in this life is dark and slippery; if you select an imperfect companion, who will lead you to the precipice, you are lost.

11. Beware of all human respect, of the accursed fear of what others will say or think of you. "If," you will say, "I give up all intercourse with such a secular; If I separate from such a one; if I consecrate myself to a retirement, to prayer, and to mortification, what will be said of me? I shall be an object of jest and derision to all." Ah! how many religious of both sexes has this accursed weakness of human respect brought to eternal misery! "Oh!" says St. Augustine, "how many has this infirmity precipitated into hell!" St. Francis Borgia says that he who desires to consecrate himself to God must, in the first place, trample under his feet all regard for what others will say of him. O my God, why do we not ask what Jesus Christ or his holy Mother will think of our conduct? "My spouse," says our Lord, "is a garden enclosed"—Cant. iv. 12. To be the true spouse of Jesus, the heart of a religious must be an enclosed garden, excluding every affection which is not for God. Remember that to cherish in the soul any strange affection is, perhaps, of all the defects of nuns, the most displeasing to God. He requires the full and undivided possession of the heart of his spouse. Even men cannot bear with any division in the affections of their spouses. In conclusion, I exhort you to endeavour to love God, as if he and you were the only beings in existence.

PRAYER.

My Jesus, I already understand thee. Thou dost desire my whole heart and all my love; and I desire to consecrate my whole soul and all my affections to thee. After all the insults which I have offered to thy majesty, I deserve to be abandoned by thee. But I feel that thou dost still call me to thy love. "Thou shalt," thou sayest, "love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart." I desire, O my God, to obey, and henceforth to love thee only. Oh! that I were wholly consumed for thee, O my Jesus, who hast been entirely consumed for my salvation. For my sake thou hast given all thy blood; for my redemption thou hast spent thy life; and shall I be reserved with thee? Even a thousand hearts are too little to love thee, and shall I give a part of this my miserable heart to creatures? No; thou dost wish for it entirely; I give it wholly to thee. Accept my being, O my Jesus, my love, and my spouse. I am thine, and entirely thine: dispose of me as thou pleasest. Mary, my hope, unite me with thy Son Jesus; make me belong entirely to him. From thee I desire this favour; from thee I hope for it.

CHAPTER XI.

ON HOLY HUMILITY.

SECTION I.

On the advantages of humility.

1. Humility has been regarded by the saints as the basis and guardian of all virtues. Although, in point of excellence, the virtue of humility does not hold the highest rank, still, according to St. Thomas, "because it is the foundation of all virtues, it has obtained the first place among them"—2. 2. q. 161, a. 5. Hence, as in the structure of an edifice, the foundation takes precedence of the walls, and even of the golden ornaments, so, to expel pride, which God resists, humility must, in the edification of the spiritual man, precede all other virtues. "Humility," says the angelic doctor, "holds the first place, inasmuch as it expels pride, which God resists"—Loc. cit. a. 4, ad. 2. Hence, St. Gregory asserts, that "he who congregates virtue without humility is like the man who carries dust against the wind"—In Psal. Pœn. 3. His virtues shall be scattered.

2. There was in the desert a certain hermit who had a high character for sanctity—In spec. exem. Dis. 9, ex. 119. At the hour of death he sent for the abbot, and asked from him the viaticum. During the administration of the Holy Sacrament a public robber ran to the cell, but, seized with compunction for his sins, he esteemed himself unworthy to enter or to be present at so sacred a ceremony, and, in the humility of his soul, exclaimed: "O that I were what you are!" The dying monk heard the words, and, swelled with pride, said: "Happy, indeed, should you be were you as holy as I am." After these words he expired: the robber immediately ran off from the place for the purpose of going to confession; on his way, he fell into a precipice and was killed. At the death of the hermit his companion burst into tears, but at the fate of the robber he exulted with joy. Being asked why he wept over the death of the former, and rejoiced at the melancholy end of the latter, he replied: "Because the robber was saved by contrition for his past sins, but my companion is damned in punishment of his pride." Do not imagine that the hermit yielded to pride only at the hour of death; from his last words, it is clear that pride had long before taken root in his heart; by its baneful influence he was brought to a miserable eternity. "Unless," says St. Augustine, "humility shall have preceded, shall be continued, and shall have followed, pride will wrest the whole from our hands"—Ep. 58, ad Diosc. Yes, the rapacious grasp of pride shall tear from us every good work which is not preceded, accompanied, and followed by humility.

3. This sublime virtue was but little known, but little loved, and greatly abhorred on earth, where pride, the cause of the ruin of Adam and of his posterity, enjoyed universal sway. Therefore the Son of God came down from heaven to teach it to men by His example as well as by his preaching. To instruct them in humility, he came upon earth in the likeness of flesh and in the form of a servant. "He emptied himself," says the Apostle, "taking the form of a servant"—Phil. ii. 7. He wished to be treated as the most contemptible of men. "Despised," says the prophet Isaias, "and the most abject of men"—Isaias liii. 3. Behold him in Bethlehem, born in a stable, and laid in a manger: in Nazareth, poor, unknown, and employed in the humble occupation of assisting a poor artizan.

Look at him in Jerusalem, scourged as a slave, buffeted as the vilest of men, crowned with thorns as a mock king, and in the end suffering, as a malefactor, the ignominious death of the cross. And with all this humiliation before your eyes, hearken to his advice: "I have given you an example, that as I have done, so you do also"—John xiii. 15. As if he said, "My children, I have embraced so much ignominy that you may not refuse abjection." Speaking of the humiliations of the Son of God, St. Augustine says: "If this medicine cure not your pride, I know not what will heal it." Hence, in one of his epistles to Dioscorus, he tells his friends that it is principally by humility a man is made the disciple of Jesus, and that the soul is prepared for an union with God. "The first," says the Saint, "is humility; the second, humility; the third, humility; and as often as you would ask, I should answer humility."

4. The proud are objects of hatred and abomination before God. "Every proud man," says the Holy Ghost, "is an abomination to the Lord"—Prov. xvi. 5. Yes; for the proud man is a robber, and is blind—he is a liar, and the truth is not in him. He is a robber, because he appropriates to himself what belongs to God. "What hast thou that thou hast not received?"—1 Cor. iv. 7. Would it not be the extreme of folly in the brute animal (where he gifted with reason) to glory in the gilded trappings of which he knows he may be stripped at the beck of his master? The proud man is blind, as we learn from the Apocalypse of St. John: "Thou sayest I am rich, and knowest not that thou art wretched and blind"—Cap. iii. 17. And what has a man of his own but nothingness and sin? Even the little he does, when examined with rigour, will appear full of imperfection. "All our justice," says St. Bernard, "if rigorously judged, will be found to be injustice." Lastly, the proud man is a liar, and the truth is not in him. For all his advantages, whether of nature—such as health, talent, beauty, and the like; or of grace—such as good desires, a docile heart, and an enlightened mind, are all the gifts of God. "By the grace of God," says St. Paul, "I am what I am."—1 Cor. xv. 10. The same Apostle tells us that of ourselves we are not capable of even a good thought. "Not that we are sufficient to think anything of ourselves as of ourselves."—2 Cor. iii. 5.

5. Woe to the proud religious! Into the haughty soul the Spirit of God cannot enter: over all her actions the devil exercises the most arbitrary despotism. "With the proud religious," says St. Joseph Calasanctius, "Satan sports himself as with a toy." Cesarius relates (Lib. iv. c. 5,) that when a demoniac was once brought to a certain monastery, the abbot asked the evil spirit if he would depart at the command of a certain young monk who was reputed a saint. "No," replied the demon, "I am not afraid of him, because he is proud." To preserve his servants from pride, the Lord sometimes permits them to be afflicted with the shameful solicitations of the flesh; to their repeated prayers to be delivered from the suggestions of Satan and of their own corruption, he appears deaf, and leaves them to combat with the temptation. It was thus he treated St. Paul; and, says the Saint, "lest the greatness of the revelations should exalt me, there was given to me a sting of the flesh, an angel of Satan to buffet me. For this thing thrice I besought the Lord that it might depart from me, and he said to me, My grace is sufficient for thee" —2 Cor. xii. 7. "To keep him humble," says St. Jerome, "the Almighty refused to deliver the Apostle from the molestation of the flesh by which he was tormented." Moreover, to teach them humility, the Lord sometimes permits the elect to fall into sin. Thus David acknowledges that he sinned, because he had not been humble. "Before I was humbled I offended"—Ps. cxviii. 67.

6. "God," says St. Augustine, "sits on high; you humble yourself, and he descends to you; you exalt yourself, and he flies from you"—Ser. de Ascen. The Royal Prophet says that "The Lord looketh at the low, and the high he knoweth afar off"—Ps. clxxxvii. He regards the humble with an affectionate eye; but the proud he beholds only at a distance. As we cannot recognise a person whom we see from afar, so the Lord appears to tell the proud, in the words of the Psalmist, that he knows them not. There was in a certain monastery a religious who had the insolence to say to one of her companions: "You and I wear, indeed, the same habit and sit at the same table; but, though my equal in religion, you are not fit to be a servant in my father's house." Oh, how poor and naked before the Lord was this haughty nun! The proud are hateful before God; he cannot bear them. As soon as the angels yielded to pride, he banished them from paradise, and sent them into hell, far distant from his presence. The words of God must be fulfilled; "Whosoever," says the Lord, "shall exalt himself shall be humbled"—Matt. xxiii. 12. St. Peter Damian relates that a certain man (Trac. de duello) had resolved to assert his right to an estate by single combat; before the time appointed for the duel he went to Mass, and hearing in the church the above-mentioned words of the Gospel:—"Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be humbled," he exclaimed: this cannot be true; for had I humbled myself, I should have lost my property and my character. But when he came to the combat his sacrilegious tongue was cut across by the sword of his antagonist, and he instantly fell dead on the ground.

7. "God," says St. James, "resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble"—Cap. iv. v. 6. The Lord has promised to hear the prayers of all. "Every one that asketh receiveth"—Luke xi. 10. The proud he hears not: according to the Apostle, he resists their petitions. But to the humble he is liberal beyond measure: "He giveth grace to the humble." To them he opens his hands, and grants whatsoever they desire. "Humble thyself to God," says the Holy Ghost, "and wait for his hands"—Eccl. xiii. 9. Humble your soul before the Lord, and expect from his hands whatever you seek from him. "Give me, O Lord," exclaims St. Augustine, "the treasure of humility." Humility is a treasure; because upon the humble the Lord pours every blessing in abundance. A heart full of self cannot be replenished with the gifts of God. To receive the divine favours the soul must be first emptied by the knowledge of her own nothingness. "Thou sendest forth," says David, "springs in the vales: between the midst of the hills the waters shall pass"—Ps. ciii. 10. God makes the waters of his graces abound in the valleys, that is, in humble souls; but not on the mountains, the emblems of the proud and the haughty. In the midst of these his graces pass, but remain not upon them. "Because," says Mary, "he hath regarded the humility of his handmaid. * * * * He that is mighty hath done great things to me"—Luke i. 48, 49. The Lord, looking upon my humility and my sense of my own nothingness, hath bestowed great favours upon me. St. Teresa relates of herself that the greatest graces which she received from God were infused into her soul when she humbled herself most before the Lord in prayer. "The prayer of him that humbleth himself shall pierce the clouds, and he will not depart till the Most High behold"—Eccl. xxxv. 21. The humble obtain from God whatever they ask: they need not be afraid of being confounded, or of being left without consolation. "Let not," says David, "the humble be turned away with confusion"—Ps. lxxiii. 21. Hence, St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say: "If you wish to be a saint, be humble; if you wish to be a very great saint, be most humble." To St. Francis Borgia, while a secular, a holy man once said: "If you desire to be a saint, never let a day pass without thinking on your miseries." Hence, the Saint spent, every day, the first two hours of prayer in the study of his own nothingness, and in sentiments of self-contempt.

8. St. Gregory says, "that pride is the most evident mark of the reprobate; but humility is, on the contrary, the most evident mark of the elect"—St. Greg. lib. 84, in Job cap. 56. Seeing the world covered with the toils of the devil, St. Anthony, with a sigh, exclaimed: "Who can escape so many snares?" "Anthony," replied a strange voice, "it is only humility that passes through them with security: the humble man is not in danger of being caught by them." In a word, unless we are like infants, not in years, but in humility, we shall never attain salvation. "Unless you become as little children, you shall not enter the kingdom of heaven"—Matt. xviii. 3. In the life of St. Palemon it is related that a certain monk who walked on burning coals, said to his companions, "which of you can tread on red hot fire without being burnt?" The saint reproved him for his vanity, but the unhappy man did not amend. Puffed up with pride, he afterwards fell into sin, and died without repentance.

9. To the humble, who are despised and persecuted on earth, is promised the glory of God's kingdom. "Blessed are ye, when they shall revile and persecute you, for your reward is very great in heaven"—Matt. v. 11, 12. The humble shall be happy in this life as well as in the next. "Learn of me," says Jesus, "because I am meek and humble of heart, and you shall find rest to your souls"—Matt. xi. 29. The proud never enjoy peace, because they never receive the respect or attention which a vain opinion of their own greatness makes them regard as their due. When loaded with honours they are not content, either because they see others still more exalted, or because they desire some unattainable dignity, the absense of which is to them a source of torture, not to be removed by the gratification arising from all the honours they enjoy. Great indeed was the glory of Aman in the court of Assuerus, where he sat at the monarch's table. But because Mardochai would not salute him he was unhappy. "And whereas I have all these things, I think I have nothing so long as I see Mardochai the Jew sitting before the king's gate"—Esther v. 13. Being the result of constraint and of human respect, the honour shown to the great does not give true joy. "True glory," says St. Jerome, "like a shadow, follows virtue; it flies from all who grasp at it, and seeks after those who despise it."

10. The humble man is always content, because whatever respect is paid to him he deems it to be above his merits; and whatever contempt may be offered to him he regards as far short of what is due to his sins. In humiliation, he exclaims with holy Job: "I have sinned, and indeed I have offended, and I have not received what I have deserved"—Job, xxxiii. 27. Previously to a long journey which he was obliged to make, St. Francis Borgia was obliged to despatch a courier, who would secure accommodation for his master at the hotels where he intended to stop. "I never," replied the saint, "fail to send my courier before me. But do you know who he is? My courior is the thought of hell, which my sins have merited; this thought makes every lodging appear to me a palace in comparison of the dungeon to which I deserved to be condemned.

PRAYER.

O my God, after having committed so many sins, how is it possible that such an excess of pride should still reign in my soul? I now see that my faults have not only rendered me ungrateful to thee, but have also made me proud. Cast me not away from thy face, as I have deserved. Have pity on me; enlighten my soul, and make me feel what I am, and what I merit. How many, for fewer sins than I have committed, are now in hell, and have no hope of pardon? I know that thou dost offer me pardon if I wish for it. Yes, Lord, I desire it; O my Redeemer, pardon me all my sins of pride, by which I have not only despised my neighbour, but have also despised thee, my Sovereign Good. With St. Catherine, of Genoa I will say: "My God, no more sins, no more sins!" I have sinned enough. I desire never more to abuse thy patience. I love thee, O my God, and I desire to spend the remainder of my life only in loving and in pleasing thee. My Jesus, assist me. The stronger my present desire to belong entirely to thee the more violently will the powers of hell tempt me to sin. Assist me, O Lord, and leave me not in my own hands. Most holy Virgin Mary, thou knowest that in thee I have placed all my hopes; do not cease to assist me by thy prayers, which God never rejects. Amen.

SECTION II.

On the humility of the intellect, or of the judgment.

humility of the intellect and the humility of the will. Here we shall speak of the former, without which the latter cannot be acquired. Humility of the intellect consists in thinking lowly of ourselves: in esteeming ourselves to be vile and miserable creatures, such as we really are. "Humility," says St. Bernard, "is a virtue which, by the knowledge of himself, makes a man contemptible in his own estimation"—Tract. de grat. hom. "Humility is truth," as St. Teresa has well said, "and therefore the Lord greatly loves the humble, because they love the truth." It is too true that we are nothing; that we are ignorant, blind, and unable to do any good. Of our own we have nothing but sin, which renders us worse than nothing; and of ourselves we can do nothing but evil. Whatever good we have or perform belongs to God, and comes from his hands. This truth the humble man keeps continually before his eyes; he therefore appropriates to himself only what is evil, deems himself worthy of all sorts of contempt, and cannot bear to hear others attribute to him what he does not deserve. On the contrary, he delights in seeing himself despised and treated according to his deserts; and thus renders his soul most pleasing to God. "A Christian," says St. Gregory, "becomes estimable before God in proportion as he is despicable in his own eyes"—Lib. 18, mor. cap. 20. Hence, speaking of nuns, St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say that "the two foundations of religious perfection are, the love of God and the contempt of self. Because," says the saint, "the nun who will have humbled herself most upon earth shall see God most clearly in heaven."

2. It is necessary then, to pray continually in the words of St. Augustine: "May I know myself; may I know thee, O my God, that thus I may love thee and despise myself"—Lib. de vit. beat. Make me, O Lord, understand what I am and what thou art. Thou art the source of every good; I am misery itself. Of myself I have nothing, I know nothing, I can do nothing but evil. It is only the humble that truly honour God. "He," says the Holy Ghost, "is honoured by the humble"—Eccl. iii. 21. Yes, it is only the humble that can give glory to the Lord, for they alone acknowledge him to be the supreme and only Good. If, then, you desire to honour God, keep continually in view all your miseries; confess in the sincerity of your soul that of yourself you are only nothingness and sinfulness, and that whatsoever you possess belongs to God. And convinced of your own wretchedness, consider yourself deserving only of contempt and punishment, and offer yourself to accept all the chastisements with which God will visit you.

3. First, be careful never to boast of anything. Far different from yours was the conduct of the saints. It is my continual practice to exhort all to read, for their spiritual lecture, the lives of the saints. The great labours and exertions of the saints for God's glory will humble our pride, and make us ashamed of the little we do, or have done for him. But how is it possible that we should glory in anything, when we know that all the virtues we possess are the gifts of God. "Who," says St. Bernard, "could abstain from laughing if the clouds boasted of having begotten rain?"—Ser. 13, in can. Whoever glories in any good action deserves to be treated with similar derision. Father M. Avila relates, that "a certain rich nobleman who had married a peasant, to prevent her from being puffed up with pride at seeing herself attended by servants and dressed in rich apparel, caused the miserable garment which she wore before her marriage to be preserved and to be kept continually before her eyes. You should imitate his example. When you perceive that you have performed a good work or acquired any virtue, look back to your former state; remember what you were, and conclude that all the good you possess is but an alms from the Almighty.

4. "Whosoever," says St. Augustine, "reckons up to thee, O Lord, his own merits, what else does he reckon up but thy gifts"—Lib. 9, Con. cap. 13, n. 1. Whenever St. Teresa performed a good work, or saw an act of virtue performed by others, she immediately burst out into the praises of God, and referred the whole to him as its author. Hence, the saint justly observes, that it is not incompatible with humility to acknowledge the special graces which God has given more abundantly to us than to others. "Such an acknowledgment," continues the saint, "is not pride; on the contrary, by making us feel that we are more unworthy, and, at the same time, more favoured than others, it assists our humility and stimulates our gratitude." The saint adds, "that a Christian who does not reflect with gratitude on the sublime graces which he has received, will never resolve to do great things for God. But, in contemplating the gifts which God has bestowed upon us, we must always distinguish between what belongs to him and what belongs to us. St. Paul scrupled not to assert, that for the glory of the Lord Jesus, he had done more than all the other apostles. "I have," he says, "laboured more abundantly than all they"—1 Cor. xv. 10. But he immediately confessed that his labours were not his own works, but the fruit of the divine grace by which he was assisted: "Yet not I, but the grace of God with me"—ibid.

5. Secondly, since without the divine aid you can do nothing, be careful never to confide in your own strength; but, after the example of St. Philip Neri, endeavour to live in continual and utter distrust of yourself. Like St. Peter, who protested that "not even death would induce him to deny his Master"—Matt. xxvi. 35, the proud man trusts in his own courage, and therefore yields to temptation. Because he confided in himself, the Apostle had no sooner entered the house of the high priest than he denied Jesus Christ. Be careful never to place confidence in your own resolutions, or in your present good dispositions, but put your whole trust in God, saying with St. Paul: "I can do all things in him who strengtheneth me"—Phil. iv. 13. If you cast away all self-confidence, and place all your hopes in the Lord, you may then expect to do great things for God. "They that hope in the Lord," says the prophet Isaias, "shall renew their strength"—Isaias xl. 31. Yes, the humble, who trust in the Lord, shall renew their strength: distrusting themselves, they shall lay aside their own weakness, and put on the strength of God. Hence, St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say, that "whoever desires to be the instrument of God in great undertakings, should seek to be the lowest of all." Strive to imitate the conduct of St. Catherine of Sienna, who when tempted to vain glory, would make an act of humility, and when tempted to despair would make an act of confidence in God. Enraged at her conduct, the devil began one day to curse her and the person who taught her this mode of resisting his temptations, and added, that he "knew not how to attack her"—Dial. cap. 67. When, therefore, Satan tells you that you are in no danger of falling, tremble, and reflect that should God abandon you for a moment you are lost. When he tempts you to despair, exclaim, in the loving words of David: "In thee, O Lord, have I hoped: let me never be confounded"—Ps. xxx. 2. In thee, O Lord, I have placed all my hopes; I trust that I shall not be confounded, deprived of thy grace, and made the slave of hell.

6. Thirdly, should you be so unfortunate as to commit a fault, take care not to give way to diffidence, but humble your soul; repent, and with a stronger sense of your own weakness, throw yourself into the arms of the Lord. To be angry with ourselves after having committed a fault is not an act of humility but of pride, which makes us wonder how we could have fallen into such a defect. Yes, it is pride and a delusion of the devil, who seeks to draw us away from the path of perfection, to cast us into despair of advancing in virtue, and thus precipitate us into more grievous sins. After a fault we should redouble our confidence in God, and thus take occasion from our infidelity to place still greater hopes in his mercy. "To them that love God," says St. Paul, "all things work together unto good" —Rom. viii. 28. "Yes," adds the Gloss, "even sins." The Lord once said to St. Gertrude: "When a person's hands are stained, he washes them, and they become cleaner than before they were soiled." So the soul that commits a fault, being purified by repentance, is made more pleasing in the eyes of God than she was before her transgression. To teach them to distrust themselves, and to confide only in him, God sometimes permits his servants, and particularly those who are not well grounded in humility, to fall into some defect. When, then, blessed sister, you commit a fault, endeavour to repair it immediately by an act of love and of sorrow: resolve to amend, and redouble your confidence in God; say with St. Catherine of Genoa: "Lord, this is the fruit of my garden, if thou dost not protect me, I shall be guilty of still more grievous offences, but I purpose to avoid this fault for the future, and with the aid of thy grace I hope to observe this resolution." Should you ever relapse, act always in the same manner, and never abandon the resolution of becoming a saint.

7. Fourthly, should you ever see another commit some grievous sin, take care not to indulge in pride, nor to be surprised at her fall; but pity her misfortune, and, trembling for yourself, say with holy David: "Unless the Lord had been my helper, my soul had almost dwelt in hell"—Ps. xciii. 17. If the Almighty had not been my protector, I should at this moment be buried in hell. Beware of even taking vain complacency in the exemption from faults which you perceive in your companions; otherwise, in chastisement of your pride, the Lord will permit you to fall into the sins which they have committed. Cassian relates (Col. 2, cap. 13,) that a certain young monk, being for a long time molested by a violent temptation to impurity, sought advice and consolation from an aged father. Instead of receiving encouragement and comfort, he was loaded with reproaches. "What," said the old man, "is it possible that a monk should be subject to such abominable thoughts?" In punishment of his pride, the Almighty permitted the father to be assailed by the spirit of impurity to such a degree that he ran like a madman through the monastery. Hearing of his miserable condition, the Abbot Apollo told him that God had permitted this temptation to punish his conduct towards the young monk, and also to teach him compassion for others in similar circumstances. The Apostle tells us that, in correcting sinners, we should not treat them with contempt, lest God should permit us to be assailed by the temptation to which they yielded, and perhaps to fall into the very sin which we were surprised to see them commit. We should, before we reprove others, consider that we are as miserable and as liable to sin as our fallen brethren. "Brethren, if any man be overtaken in a fault . . . instruct such a one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted"—Gal. vi. 1. The same Cassian relates (Lib. 5, de Inst.) that a certain abbot, called Machete, confessed that he himself had miserably fallen into three faults, of which he had rashly judged his brethren.

8. Fifthy, consider yourself the greatest sinner on this earth. They who are truly humble, because they are most perfectly enlightened by God, possess the most perfect knowledge, not only of the divine perfections, but also of their own miseries and sins. Hence, notwithstanding their extraordinary sanctity, the saints, not in the language of exaggeration, but in the sincerity of their souls, call themselves the greatest sinners in the world. Thus, St. Francis of Assisium called himself the worst of sinners: St. Thomas of Villanova was kept in a state of continual fear and trembling by the thought of the account he was one day to render to God of his life, which, though full of virtue, appeared to him very wicked. St. Gertrude considered it a miracle that the earth did not open under her feet and swallow her up alive in punishment of her sins. St. Paul, the first hermit, was in the habit of exclaiming: "Woe to me a sinner, who am unworthy to bear the name of a monk." In the writings of Father M. Avila (Trac. 5, de Spir. Sanc. cap. 4) we read of a person of great sanctity, who besought the Lord to make known to her the state of her soul. Her prayer was heard, and so deformed and abominable was the appearance of her soul, though stained only with the guilt of venial sins, that, struck with horror, she cried out: "For mercy's sake, O Lord, take away from before my eyes the representation of this monster."

9. Beware, then, of ever preferring yourself to any one. To esteem yourself better than others is abundantly sufficient to make you worse than all. "Others," says Tritemius, "you have despised: you have therefore become worse than others." Again, to entertain a high opinion of your own deserts is enough to deprive you of all merit. Humility consists principally in a sincere conviction that we deserve only reproach and chastisement. If by preferring yourself to others you shall have abused the gifts and graces which God has conferred upon you, they will only serve for your greater condemnation at the hour of judgment. But it is not enough to abstain from preferring yourself to any one, it is moreover necessary to consider yourself the last and worst of all your sisters in religion. First, because in yourself you see with certainty so many sins; but the sins of others you know not, and their secret virtues, which are hidden from your eyes, may render them very dear in the sight of God. You ought to consider also, that by the aid of the lights and graces which you have received from God you should at this moment be a saint. Ah! had they been given to an infidel, he would perhaps have become a seraph, and you are still so miserable and full of defects. The consideration of your ingratitude should be sufficient to make you always regard yourself as a fit object of scorn to the whole community; for, as St. Thomas teaches, the malice of sin increases in proportion to the ingratitude of the sinner. Hence, one of your sins may be more grievous in the sight of God than a hundred sins of another less favoured than you have been. But you know that you have already committed many sins; that your life has been one continued series of voluntary faults; and that whatever good you may have done is so full of imperfection and of self-love, that it is more deserving of punishment than of remuneration.

10. All these considerations ought to inspire you with the sentiments of humility which St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi inculcated to her spiritual children, with a continual sense of your unworthiness to kiss the ground on which your sisters walk. You ought to consider that, had you received all imaginable insults, and were confined in the bottom of hell, under the feet of all the damned, all this would be but little in comparison of what you deserve. And, therefore, from the bottomless abyss of your own miseries, you should continually cry out, with holy David: "Incline unto my aid, O God, O Lord, make haste to help me." Lord, hasten to my assistance, otherwise I am lost, and shall offend thee more than ever and more than all sinners. But this prayer must be repeated continually—almost every moment—in the choir, in the cell, in going through the monastery, at the grate, at table, at rising, and going to sleep. You must cry out: "Assist me, O Lord! assist me: Lord, have mercy on me." At the very moment you cease to invoke the divine aid you may become the most wicked monster in creation. Shun, as death itself, every, even the most trifling, act or thought of pride. I conclude this chapter with that great saying of St. Bernard: "In the soul no humiliation, however great, is to be feared; but the least elation is to be regarded with horror"—Ser. 3, in Cant. Yes; for the smallest degree of arrogance may lead us into every evil.

PRAYER.

O God of my soul! I thank thee for making me feel that whatever the world esteems is all folly. Give me grace to detach my heart from all creatures before death separates me from them. Unhappy me, who have been so many years in thy house; I have left the world to become a Saint, and till now what progress have I made? Alas! how many disgusting wounds do I see in my soul! My Jesus, have pity on me, and heal me. Thou art able and willling to heal me, if I consent to a change of life. Yes, Lord, I desire to amend. If the sinner repent, thou hast promised to forget his wickedness. "But if the wicked do penance * * * * I will not remember all his iniquities"—Ezech. xviii. 21. I am sorry, O my God, above all things, for having despised thy love; forget, then, O Lord, all the displeasure I have given thee. For the future, I desire to lose my life sooner than give thee the smallest offence. My God, I desire to love thee; if I do not love thee, whom shall I love? Thou art most worthy of my love. Thou hast called me to religion. Thou hast loaded me with thy grace. Thou alone, therefore, dost merit all my love; thee alone do I desire to love. My queen and my great advocate, Mary, assist me by thy intercession, that I may be no longer ungrateful to thy Son. Amen.

SECTION III.

On humility of the will, or of the affection.

1. HUMILITY of the intellect consists, as we have seen, in esteeming one-self worthy of reproach and scorn; but humility of the will consists in desiring to be despised by others, and in taking pleasure in contempt. The latter is the most meritorious; because acts of the will are more pleasing to God than acts of the intellect. Speaking of humility of the will, St. Bernard says: "The first degree is not to wish for power; the second to wish to be in a state of subjection to authority; the third is, in subjection, to bear injuries with equanimity"—Ser. 18. Such is the humility of the heart, which Jesus Christ wished to teach us by his own example. "Learn of Me," said the Redeemer, "because I am meek and humble of heart"—Matt. xi. 29. Many have humility on their tongue, but not in their heart. "They, indeed," says St. Gregory, "confess with their lips that they are most wicked, and most deserving of all sorts of chastisement, but they believe not what they say. For when rebuked they give way to disquietude, and deny that they are guilty of the fault for which they are corrected. To this class belonged a certain monk, who, as Cassian relates, used to say that he was a great sinner, and unworthy to breathe a breath of life. But when the Abbot Serapion corrected him for violating rule by idle visits to the cells of the other monks, he became greatly troubled. Seeing him disturbed, the abbot said: "Why, my son,are you so much disquieted? Hitherto you have called yourself a great sinner, and now you cannot bear from me a charitable admonition." Even in convents, we sometimes find similar examples of haughty religious! Certain nuns proclaim that they are the most wicked of sinners, that they deserve a thousand hells. But should the abbess or a sister in religion point out to them any particular fault, or speak of their general tepidity, or of the little edification which they give to the community,they immediately begin to vindicate their conduct, and in a tone of fretfulness exclaim: What evil or scandal have you seen in my conduct? You would do your duty much better by correcting the others,who are guilty of faults which I never commit. A little before, they confessed that their sins merited a thousand hells, and now they cannot bear a word of admonition. Such religious possess, indeed, humility in words, but know not the humility recommended by Jesus Christ, which is the humility of the heart.

2. "There is," says the Holy Ghost, "one that humbleth himself wickedly, and his interior is full of deceit"—Eccl. xix. 23. There are some who humble themselves, not from desire of being rebuked and despised, but through a motive of being esteemed humble and of being praised for their humility. But, according to St. Bernard, to seek praise for voluntary humiliations is not humility, but the destruction of humility (Ser. 16, in cant.) for it changes humility itself into an object of pride. Speculative humility, says St. Vincent of Paul, presents a very beautiful aspect; but practical humility, because it is nothing else than the love of abjection and contempt, is an object of horror to flesh and blood. Hence, St. John Climacus observes that the proof of true humility consists not in confessing our own sinfulness, but in rejoicing in the contempt due to sinners. "Self-disparagement," says the Saint, "is good, but to confirm the dispraise which others cast upon us, not to resent it, but to delight in it, is still better." "When," says St. Gregory, "the humble man calls himself a sinner, he does not contradict others who say the same of him." No; when reproved for his faults, he reasserts his own sinfulness. In a word, as St. Bernard says, "the truly humble man wishes, indeed, to be held in little estimation, but desires not to be praised for his humility"—Loc. cit. Instead of seeking to be esteemed for his humility, he wishes to be regarded as a man deserving of contempt and full of imperfections; and because he deems himself worthy only of abjection, he delights in the humiliations which are heaped upon him. Hence, as St. Bernard teaches, "he converts humiliation into humility;" and all the humiliations which he receives only serve to render him more humble. St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say, that "he who loves God seeks not to be reputed a saint, but to attain sanctity."

3. If, O blessed sister, you wish to acquire true humility of heart, you must, in the first place, shun all self-praise, whether it regards your own actions, talents, or virtues, or the nobility, wealth, or connections of your family. "Let another praise thee," says the wise man, "and not thy own mouth"—Prov. xxvii. 2. Self-praise never fails to earn the contempt, but seldom wins the respect, of others. What would you say or think of a nun who would extol the respectability of her family, or who would boast of having better claims than her sisters to certain offices? Remember that if you indulge in empty boasting, others will say and think of you what you would say and think of her. In speaking of your own concerns, seek always to humble and never to exalt yourself. Self-dispraise can do you no injury; but the smallest portion of unmerited self-commendation may be productive of great evil. "To extol yourself slightly above your deserts is," says St. Bernard, "a great evil"—Ser. 37, in Cant. He who in passing through a door bends his head more than is necessary, is free from all danger of injury; but he who carries it too high may be seriously hurt. Be careful, then, to speak of yourself humbly rather than boastingly, and to disclose your faults rather than your virtues. The best rule is never to speak well or ill of yourself, but to regard yourself as unworthy to be even named in conversation. It frequently happens that in saying what tends to our own confusion we indulge a secret and refined pride. For the confusion arising from the voluntary manifestation of our defects excites within us a desire of obtaining the praise or reputation of being humble. This rule is not to be observed in the tribunal of penance: on the contrary, it will be always useful to make known to the confessor your defects, your evil inclinations, and, generally speaking, even the evil thoughts which pass through your mind. It is also very profitable to manifest on some occasions certain circumstances which redound to your shame. On such occasions be careful not to abstain from humbling your own pride. Father Villanova, of the Society of Jesus, was not ashamed to tell the whole community that his brother was a poor labourer. Father Sacchini, likewise a Jesuit, having in a public place met his father, who was a muleteer, instantly ran to embrace him, and exclaimed: "Oh, behold my father."

4. Should it ever happen that you are compelled to listen to your own praise, endeavour to humble yourself, at least interiorly, by casting an eye at the grounds of self-contempt which have been already detailed. "To the proud," says St. Gregory, "praise, however undeserved, is delicious; but to the humble, even well-merited commendation is a source of grief and affliction." "And being exalted," says the Royal Prophet, "I have been humbled and troubled"—Ps. lxxxvi. 16. Like holy David, the humble man, says St. Gregory, "is troubled at hearing his own praises." He sees that he has no claim to the virtues or to the good qualities which are ascribed to him; and he fears that by taking self-complacency in his good works, he may lose whatever merit he has acquired before God, and that the Judge may say to him: "Thou didst receive good things in thy life time"—Luke xvi. 25. Whoever takes pleasure in listening to his own praise, has already received his reward: he has no claim to any other remuneration. "As gold," says the wise man, "is tried in the furnace, so a man is tried by the mouth of him that praiseth"—Prov. xxvii. 21. Yes, a man's spirit is tried by praise: when the commendation of his virtues excites sentiments, not of pleasure nor of pride, but of shame and confusion, then, indeed, his humility appears. St. Francis Borgia and St. Lewis Gonzaga were greatly afflicted whenever they heard themselves extolled. When you are praised or treated with respect, humble your soul and tremble, lest the honour which you receive should be to you an occasion of sin and perdition. Consider that the esteem of men may prove your greatest misfortune: by fomenting pride, it may contaminate your heart, and thus be the cause of your damnation.

5. Keep always before your eyes the great saying of St. Francis of Assisium: "What I am before God, that I am, and no more." Are you so foolish as to think that the esteem of men will render you more pleasing in the sight of God? When you are gratified and elated by the praises bestowed upon you, and are by them induced to think yourself better than the other religious, you may be assured that, while men extol your virtues, God will cut you off. Be persuaded, then, that the praises of others will never make you more holy in the sight of God. St. Augustine says, that "as the reproach or slander of an enemy cannot deprive a man of the merit of his virtues, so the applause of a friend or admirer will not make him better than he really is." "A bad conscience is not healed by the praise of a flatterer, nor a good one wounded by the contumely of the reviler"—S. Aug. l. 3, con. petil. Whenever, then, you hear your own praises, say in your heart, with St. Augustine: "I know myself better than they do: and God knows me better than I do myself"—In Ps. xxv. They indeed praise me, but I, who see the state of my own soul better than they do, know that these praises are unmerited; God knows it still better than I do; he sees that I deserve neither honour or respect, but all the contempt of earth and hell.

6. Secondly, as you ought carefully to refrain from all complacency in the praises which you receive from others, so you must abstain with still greater caution from asking any office of rank or dignity in the convent. "You must," as St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi says, "avoid with all possible care every exercise which is calculated to attract attention; for, it is in such exercises that pride delights." It is necessary to shun, even with horror, every honourable office in the monastery. In the convent of the Most Holy Trinity, in Naples, there was a very exemplary religious, called sister Archangela Sanfelice. The confessor said to her one day: "Sister Archangela, the nuns wish to make you abbess." At first she appeared afflicted and surprised, but afterwards expressed her readiness to accept the office. After signifying her assent, she was suddenly seized with a fit of apoplexy, which nearly deprived her of life, and obliged the nuns to seek another abbess. "All worldly houours," says St. Hilary, "is the business of the devil"—in Matt. vi. 3. Worldly honours are the means by which Satan gains many souls for hell. And if the ambition of honours occasions great ruin in a worldling, it is productive of far greater havoc in a religious. "The body of a church," says St. Leo, "is defiled by the contention of the ambitious"—S. Leo, Ep. 1. Speaking of nuns, St. Teresa (com. d. per. c. 13) says, that "Where they attend to punctilios of honours fervour will never flourish." In another place she says: "The monastery in which points of honour and claims of precedence are attended to may be considered as lost: from it the spouse is already banished." Addressing her own community, she says: "Should a Judas be ever found among you, expel her at once, as a source of infection, and deprive for ever of all hope of success in her projects the nun who attempts to seek superiority over her companions. I would rather see this monastery burnt to the ground than ever see ambition enter into it." Similar were the sentiments of St. Jane Chantal. "I would," says the Saint, "sooner see my monastery buried in the sea than ambition or the desire of office enter into it."

7. Listen to the wise remarks of Peter de Blois on this subject. In his fourteenth epistle he describes the pestiferous effects of ambition, and its frightful ravages in the souls of Christians. "Ambition," he says, "though full of uncharitableness, puts on the garb of charity. Charity suffers all things for the attainment of eternal goods: ambition, too, endures every hardship, but only for the acquisition of the miserable honours of the world. Charity is kind, but particularly to the poor and the abject; ambition, too, abounds in benevolence, but only to the rich and powerful, who can gratify its cravings. Charity bears all things to please God: ambition submits to every wrong, but only through the vain motive of obtaining honours or office. O God! to what annoyance, inconvenience, fatigues, fears, expenses, and even reproaches and insults, must the ambitious submit for the attainment of the dignity to which they aspire. Finally, charity believes and hopes all that regards the glory of eternity; but ambition believes and hopes only what regards the empty honours of this life.

8. But in the end, what is the fruit of all the labours of the ambitious? They only attain some empty dignity which contents not the heart, and which renders them in the eyes of the others objects of contempt rather than of respect. "By the sole desire of it," says St. Teresa, "honour is lost: the greater the dignity obtained the more disgraceful it is to the person who has procured it. For the more he has laboured for its attainment the more he has shown himself unworthy of it." St. Jane Chantal said, that "they who esteem themselves most deserving of office are the most unworthy of it, because they want humility, which is the best disposition for the fulfilment of an office." God grant that the dignity which the ambitious procure may not be the cause of their eternal ruin. Father Vincent Caraffa, of the Society of Jesus, having once visited a dying friend to whom an office of great emolument, but at the same time of great danger, had been given, was requested by the sick man to obtain from God the restoration of his health. "No, my friend," replied the father, "I shall not abuse my affection for you; desirous of your salvation, God calls you to another life while you are in the state of grace. I know not whether, if restored to health, you would save your soul in the office which has been offered to you." The sick man peacefully accepted the stroke of death, and expired with sentiments of joy and resignation. "It is scarcely possible," says St. Bonaventure, "that he who delights in honours should not be in great danger" —Med. c. 36. To take complacency in any dignity, particularly in the office of abbess, of assistant, mistress of novices, or in any other charge to which are annexed serious obligations, exposes a religious to great danger of perdition. But the condition of a nun who, through ambition, has procured such an office, is still more perilous. For she cannot, without great difficulty, refuse any request to the sisters by whom she was promoted, and thus she will probably be lost. Besides, God is not bound to give her the aid necessary for the discharge of the duties of an office which she has procured by her own exertions. How, then, can she, bereft of the divine assistance, fulfil her obligations? Oh! how many shall we see condemned on the day of judgment for having obtained offices by their own efforts.

9. If, blessed sister, you desire to preserve humility, do not allow yourself to be seduced by any desire of worldly glory. What shall I say to the nun who, to make a display of pomp and riches, is guilty of extravagance in the discharge of her office? What shall I say of the nun who, though a poor religious, receives with pleasure worldly titles? Were she truly humble, she would tell all, even the servants of her parents, that such titles are neither agreeable nor suited to her. It is certain that to a nun the title of reverend is more honourable than the appellation of noble; because the former is given to her as the spouse of Jesus; but it is only as a person of rank in the world that she can claim the latter. St. Francis Xavier used to say (Vita, lib. 1, 2, c. 3,) that to desire respect and honour, or to take complacency in them, is unworthy of a Christian, who should have always before his eyes the ignominies of Jesus Christ. How much more unsuited must such foolish ambition be to a religious, the consecrated spouse of the Redeemer, who lived for so many years in obscurity and contempt? St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that "the honour of a nun consists in being the lowest of all, and in having a horror of being preferred to any." "To surpass all her sisters in humility and in the love of Jesus should," says St. Thomas of Villanova, "be the sole object of the ambition of religious." "Let your ambition be, to be the most humble and the most dear to Jesus Christ." In entering religion you said, with holy David: "I have chosen to be an abject in the house of my God, rather than to dwell in the tabernacles of sinners"—Ps. lxxxiii. 11. Yes, you then publicly declared your determination to prefer abjection in the house of the Lord before honour and glory in a wicked world. And why should you be now attached to earthly vanities? St. Bonaventure tells you, that if you desire to be a saint, you must endeavour to lead a life of obscurity and contempt. "Love," says the saint, "to be unknown and despised," so that no attention whatever may be shown to you in the monastery.

10. Envy not the religious who surpass you in talent and understanding, or who are more highly esteemed by the community than you are. Envy those only who are your superiors in charity and humility. Humiliation is preferable to all the applause and honour which the world can bestow. For a nun the most useful of all sciences is that which teaches her to humble and despise herself, and to delight in being treated with contempt. God has not given you great abilities, because they might lead you to perdition. Be content then with the little talent which you have received: let the want of talent be to you an occasion of practicing humility, which is the safest, and indeed the only way to save your soul, and to become a saint. If others surpass you in the knowledge of governing, or in the art of acquiring the esteem of the community, take care to outstrip all in the practice of humility. "But," says St. Paul, "let each esteem others better than themselves"—Phil. ii. 3. They who are invested with authority over others are exposed to great danger of being puffed up with pride, of losing the divine light, and of thus becoming like senseless beasts, that seek only the miserable goods of the earth, and never think of the glory of eternity. "And," says the Psalmist, "when he was in honour he did not understand: he is compared to senseless beasts, and is become like to them"—Ps. xlviii. 13. If you wish to walk in the secure path, shun all posts of honour, and embrace the most abject exercises and offices. A religious who wishes to be a saint should seek only the meanest offices of the convent; and, therefore, she ought frequently to beg of the superior, and of them that are in office, to employ her in the occupations which others decline. The spouse of the Canticles presents, at one time, the character of a solitary; at another, of a warrior; and again of the cultivator of the vine; but she always appears full of love. Like her, every religious should perform all her actions through the love of her spouse; and in all her occupations should appear as a lover of Jesus Christ; and, therefore, she should not refuse any office or employment. The employments which the world regards as the most contemptible are the most important and exalted in religion, and are most sought after by the saints, because they are most dear to Jesus Christ. Cassian relates, that, to shun the respect and veneration shown to him in Egypt, the Abbot Penunzio fled from that country and betook himself to the monastery of St. Pachomius. Being unknown, he was at first entrusted with the cultivation of the garden, and enjoyed great happiness in his humble employment. As soon as he was recognised he was removed from so mean a charge. But he wept continually for having lost the treasure which he found in his humiliation.

11. Endeavour also to practice humility by the poverty of your furniture and of your garments. The dress of St. Equitius was so humble that, as St. Gregory relates, "they who had not known him would have scorned to salute him." Oh! what a source of edification is poverty of dress! Of the two Macariuses it is related that, "in passing the Nile along with certain seculars richly attired, the poverty of their garments made such an impression on one of the seculars that he abandoned the world and became a monk." To keep the eyes modestly cast down, and to speak in a low tone of voice helps to preserve humility. But it must be observed that such external acts assist humility of the heart when they are united with it. Without it they would be acts of pride, the most abominable of pride, concealed under the garb of humility. "Pride," says St. Jerome, "is far more deformed when it is hid under the outward appearance of humility"—Ep. ad Gilantiam.

PRAYER.

My Jesus, I am ashamed to appear before thee: thou hast loved contempt and opprobrium, so as to die on the cross an object of derision and of scorn, and I cannot bear the smallest affront! Thou, the innocent Lamb of God, hast, for my sake, been saturated with ignominies, and I, a sinner, am so desirous of praise and honour! Ah, my spouse, how unlike am I to thee! This makes me tremble for my eternal salvation; for the predestined must be conformable to thy image. But I will not distrust thy mercy. It is from thee I expect succour and a change of life. With thy assistance I purpose, henceforward, to suffer, for the love of thee, all the contempt and all the injuries which shall be offered to me. Ah! Lord, by thy example thou hast rendered ignominies agreeable and delightful to all who love Thee. I love Thee, and desire to do all that I can to please Thee. Pardon me all my sins of pride, of which I now repent with my whole heart; and give me strength to be faithful to the promise which I now make, never more to resent any affront which I may receive. O Mary, my mother, the model of humility, obtain for me the grace to imitate thee as much as possible. Amen.

Continuation of the same subject, and on bearing contempt.

1. In the third place, to preserve humility, you must not allow yourself to be disquieted by reproof or correction. The nun who, when rebuked, yields to disquietude, shows that she has not yet acquired humility; and, therefore, should beg of God that holy virtue which is so necessary for salvation. Father Rodriguez says that "some religious resemble the hedgehog: when touched they become all thorns, and instantly break out into words of impatience, of reproach, and even of murmuring." "We have known many," says St. Gregory, "who, when one accuses them, confess themselves sinners; but when they have been corrected for a fault, they endeavour with all their might to defend themselves, and to remove the imputation of guilt"—Mor. lib. 22, cap. 10. Such, too, is the practice of certain religious—they ought to attend to the words of the Holy Ghost: "He that hateth to be reproved walketh in the trace of a sinner"—Eccl. xxi. 7. Whoever is disturbed by correction walks not in the way of the just, but in the path of sinners—the road to hell.

2. St. Bernard says: "Medicanti irascitur qui non irascitur sagittanti"—Serm. 3, de Nat. Dom. Some are displeased with the physician who cures them by reproof, and are not angry with the man who wounds them by flattery. Terrible is the threat of the wise man against all who spurn correction: "Because they have despised all my reproof the prosperity of the fools shall destroy them"—Prov. i. 30 and 32. The prosperity of fools consists in the privation, or in the contempt, of advice; and, therefore, they are miserably lost. The venerable Bede gives a frightful account of the fate of two nuns who despised the admonitions of their superior. Their irregularity became so great that they at length fled from the monastery. When brought back to the convent they were asked by the abbess, St. Borgontofora, "what had led them into such crime?" They answered: "that it was their inattention to her admonitions." Shortly after their return both were seized with a mortal disease, but could not be induced to confess their sins. Even at the point of death, to those who exhorted them to have recourse to the tribunal of penance, they replied, "wait a little, wait;" and turning to the religious, they exclaimed: "Do you not see the crowd of demons who are come to carry us away?" Calling for respite from the demons, they both died miserably, without the sacraments.

3. St. Chrysostom says (Hom. 69, in Matt.) that "the just man when discovered in a fault weeps for his fall The sinner, too," says the Saint, "if detected in a criminal act, weeps not for his transgression, but because his guilt is known; and, instead of repenting, he seeks to defend his conduct, and pours out his indignation on the friend who corrects him." Have you, O blessed sister, hitherto indulged in anger against those from whose charity you have received correction? And if you have, are you disposed to repeat such conduct? "Sister," says St. Bernard, "give many thanks to him who has rebuked you; be not sad when he shall have shown you the way to salvation"—De Dis. cap. 18. Is it not most unjust to be displeased with the sister who points out to you the way to eternal life? Could it be done without violating rule, you would do well to procure, according to the advice of St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, a faithful companion, who would remark to you all the faults which you do not perceive. You know that you are full of miseries and defects. The only remedy for them is to humble your soul when you perceive them, or when others make them known to you. "Our humility," says St. Augustine, "is perfection"—in Ps. cxxx. Since our manner of practicing the virtues of the Gospel is so full of imperfection, let us at least be perfect in humbling ourselves, and in rejoicing under the confusion occasioned by the reproofs we receive for the faults we have committed. It may be here observed, that to our pride undeserved reproach is more tolerable than well-merited censure, because the latter is more painful to self-love. When justly reproved, be careful to offer to God, in atonement for your transgression, the shame and confusion which you experience. Make use of that confusion as a means of repairing your fault; press the scorpion to the wound he has inflicted, and be assured that the mercy of the Lord, in granting you pardon, will be proportioned to your humility in receiving correction.

4. When corrected for a fault be careful never to defend or excuse yourself, and thus you will practice an act of humility highly pleasing to God. St. Teresa says, that "to a nun, such an act is more profitable than to assist at ten sermons." Should you, then, ever receive an unmerited reprimand, abstain, in honour of holy humility, from the vindication of your conduct, unless, to prevent scandal to the community, such vindication is necessary. To a religious who requested her director, Father Anthony Torres, to excuse her to a certain person who had charged her with a fault, the father replied: "I am astonished at your request. I pity your weakness. I suppose that the occupations in which you were engaged for the last few days must have soon obliterated from your mind the remembrance of the doleful narrative which you so lately heard of the sorrows of your spouse, who had been called a seducer. It is impossible that you can have remembered the calumnies and the blasphemies that were uttered against him, and at the same time request me to vindicate your character. Filled with sentiments of shame and confusion, and prostrate before the crucifix, implore of your crucified spouse the pardon of your infidelity. Resolve neither on this nor on any other occasion to justify or excuse your conduct: but always to acknowledge, however galling such acknowledgment may be, that you have erred. For your sake the Saviour died on a cross, saturated with opprobrium; and it is by humiliation that you are to obtain the possession of your spouse." St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi says, that "to excuse oneself, even under a false accusation, is to cease to be religious." A truly humble religious not only abstains from excusing her faults, but even seeks to make them known to all. In the Prodigies of Greece we read that a certain religious of the reformed order of La Trappe, as soon as he committed a fault, confessed it—first to the abbot, then to the prior, and afterwards before the whole chapter. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that "the nun who manifests her faults merits to be washed from them by the blood of Jesus Christ."

5. Fourthly, if you wish to acquire perfect humility, accept in peace all the contempt and bad treatment which you receive. These are easily borne by all who truly believe that in punishment of their sins they merit nothing but scoffs and insults. Humiliation is the touchstone of sanctity. St. Chrysostom says, that "to receive affronts with meekness is the most certain proof of virtue." In his "History of Japan," Father Crasset relates that during the last persecution, in consequence of having received an insult without resenting it, a certain Augustinian missionary, though disguised, was instantly taken for a Christian, and cast into prison by the idolaters, who asserted that no one but a Christian could practice such a virtue. "Some," says St. Francis of Assisium, "imagine that sanctity consists in the recital of many prayers, or in the performance of works of penance; but not understanding the great merit of patience under insult, they cannot bear an injurious word." You will acquire more merit by meekly receiving an affront than by fasting ten days on bread and water. It will sometimes happen that a privilege which is refused to you will be conceded to others: that what you say will be treated with contempt, while the words of others are heard with respectful attention; that while the actions of others are the theme of general praise, and they are elected to the offices of honour, you are passed by unnoticed, and your whole conduct is made a subject of derision. If you accept in peace all these humiliations, and if, with a sisterly affection, you recommend to God those from whom you receive the least respect, then indeed, as St. Dorothy says, "it will be manifest that you are truly humble." To them you are particularly indebted; since, by their reproaches, they cure your pride—the most malignant of all the diseases that lead to spiritual death. Because they deem themselves worthy of all honours, the proud convert their humiliations into an occasion of pride: but because the humble consider themselves deserving only of opprobrium, their humiliations serve to increase their humility. "That man," says St. Bernard, "is truly humble who converts humiliation into humility"—Ser. 24, in Cant.

6. Voluntary humiliations, such as to serve the sick, to kiss the feet of those who imagine, even unjustly, that we have offended them, and similar acts of humility, are very profitable; but to embrace with cheerfulness, for the love of Jesus Christ, the humiliations which come from others —such as reproofs, accusations, insults, and derisions—is still more meritorious. "Gold and silver," says the Holy Ghost, "are tried by the fire, but acceptable men in the furnace of humiliation"—Eccl. ii. 5. As gold is tried in the fire, so a man's perfection is proved by humiliation. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that "untried virtue is not virtue." He who does not suffer contempt with a tranquil mind shall never attain the spirit of perfection. "My spikenard," says the spouse, "sent forth the odour thereof"—Cant. i. 11. The spikenard is an odoriferous plant, whose scent is drawn forth only by friction and trituration. Oh! what an odour of sweetness does the humble religious exhale when she embraces in peace all manner of contempt, and delights in seeing herself maltreated and despised as the most contemptible among her sisters. A monk of the name of Zachary, being asked the best means of attaining humility, took his cowl, put it under his feet, and, trampling on it, said: "He who takes pleasure in being treated like this cowl is truly humble." Ah! how happy the death of the religious who has lived in abjection in her monastery, and has always borne her humiliations in peace. Her soul shall overflow with feelings, not of dislike, but of thanksgiving, to all who have despised her. St. John Climacus relates, (de obed. grad. 4) that a good monk, called Abarius, who had for fifteen years been treated contemptuously by others, at the hour of death returned them many thanks for their charity in having afforded him so many occasions of humiliation, and thus expired in celestial peace.

7. There are some who imagine that they are humble because they feel a strong conviction of their own miseries and a deep sorrow for their past sins. But they will not submit to humiliations, and cannot endure the slightest want of respect or esteem, and, therefore, they shun all humble offices and whatever is not flattering to their pride. They acknowledge that they are worthy of all sorts of ignominy, but cannot bear any mark of inattention: on the contrary, they seek continually to be treated with respect and honour. "There is," says the Holy Ghost, "one that humbleth himself wickedly, and his interior is full of deceit"—Eccl. xix. 23. There are some who practice external humility by confessing that they are the worst of sinners, but in their hearts they seek after honours and the esteem of men. I hope, O blessed sister, that you do not belong to that class of Christians. If you sincerely believe that you are a greater sinner than any of your sisters, be content to be treated as the lowest among them; love as your best friends all who, by despising you, assist you to practice humility and to detach your heart from earthly glory; and thus to unite your soul more closely to God, and to seek nothing in this life but his holy love.

8. Consider yourself as only worthy of universal horror; offer yourself to God, professing your readiness to suffer for his sake, and in satisfaction for your offences, all manner of opprobrium, and never permit self-love to complain of the contempt with which you are treated. Remember that they who have dared to despise the Almighty merit far greater contempt ; they deserve to be the foot-stool of the devils for all eternity in hell. "I know no remedy", says St. Bernard, "better calculated to heal the wounds of my conscience than opprobrium and contumely"—Ep. ad Eug. Rejoice, then, blessed spouse of the Lord, when you are humbled, and treated as the least of your sisters ; or when you see yourself an object of derision, and regarded by all as the most foolish and contemptible member of the community. When censured, even without grounds, neither excuse yourself, nor seek to be excused by others ; unless, as I have already said, you see that your justification is absolutely necessary to prevent scandal. Do not hinder others to disclose your faults to the superior. When you receive any humiliation, seek not to know the sister who was the occasion of it; and should you discover her name, be careful not to reprove her, nor to show that you know it, nor to complain of her conduct: on the contrary, in your prayers for others, pray in the first place for her, and for all by whom you have been despised or persecuted. Be persuaded of the truth of what Father Alvarez used to say, "the time of humiliation is the time for putting off our own miseries, and for acquiring great merits." St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that "crosses and ingominies are the greatest favours which God is accustomed to bestow on his beloved spouses." In conversing with those who are despised, she experienced great consolation from the conviction that they were most dear to Jesus Christ. Hence, she fervently exhorted the religious to place all their happiness in being treated with contempt. But above all, it is necessary to keep before your eyes what the Redeemer has said, that happy is he who is hated and cast out by men. "Blessed shall you be when men hate you, and when they shall separate you, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of Man's sake"—Luke vi. 22. The Apostle St. Peter adds: "If you be reproached for the name of Christ you shall be blessed: for that which is of the honour, glory, and power of God, and that which is his spirit resteth upon you"—1 Pet. iv. 14. When you are insulted for the sake of Jesus Christ.

then shall you be happy; for then shall the true honour, the true power, and the true spirit of God rest upon you.

9. The saints have not been made saints by applause and honour, but by injuries and insults. St. Ignatius Martyr, a bishop, and an object of universal esteem and veneration, was sent to Rome as a criminal, and on his way experienced from the soldiers who conducted him nothing but the most barbarous insolence. In the midst of his sufferings and humiliations, he joyfully exclaimed: "I now begin to be a disciple of Christ." I now begin to be a true disciple of my Jesus, who endured so many ignominies for my sake. St. Francis Borgia, when travelling, slept one night in the same room with his companion, Father Bustamente, who, in consequence of a severe attack of asthma, spent the whole night in coughing and casting out phlegm, unconsciously on the saint, and frequently in his face. In the morning Father Bustamente perceived his mistake, and was greatly afflicted at having given so much cause of pain to the saint. "Father," said St. Francis, "be not disturbed, for there is no part of this room so fit for the reception of spittle as my face." Oh! God, what must become of the religious who will not submit to an insult for the love of Jesus Christ? The nun who cannot bear contempt, shows that she has lost sight of Jesus crucified. Standing once before the crucifix, blessed Mary of the Incarnation said to her sisters in religion: "Is it possible, dear sisters, that we refuse to embrace contempt, when we see Jesus Christ reviled and scoffed?" A certain holy religious having been affronted, when before the blessed sacrament, he said: "Lord, I am very poor, I have nothing to present to you, but I offer you the injury which I have just received." Oh! how lovingly does Jesus Christ embrace all who embrace contempt for his sake! He soon consoles and enriches them with his graces. Father Anthony Torres was once unjustly charged with disseminating false doctrines, and, in punishment of his supposed transgression, was for many years deprived of faculties to hear confessions. But in a letter to a certain friend, he says: "Be assured, that during the whole time I was calumniated the spiritual consolations which the Lord gave me, surpassed any I ever received from him."

10. To suffer contempt with a serene countenance, not only merits a great reward, but also serves to draw others to God. "He," says St. John Chrysostom, "who is meek, is useful to himself and to others." The man who meekly bears affronts, is useful to himself and to all who behold him. For nothing is more edifying to a neighbour than the meekness of a man who receives injuries with a tranquil countenance. "Nothing," adds the saint, "conciliates friends to the Lord so much as to see a man agreeable by his meekness." Father Maffei relates, that a Jesuit, while preaching in Japan, having been spit upon by an insolent bystander, removed the spittle with his handkerchief, and continued his sermon as if nothing had happened. One of his auditors exclaimed that "a doctrine which teaches such humility must be true and divine, and was instantly converted to the faith." Thus, also, St. Francis de Sales converted innumerable heretics, by his meekness in bearing the insults which he received from them.

11. A religious who lives in a monastery of relaxed observance, and who wishes to walk in the way of perfection, may be assured, that during her life she shall be an object of continual derision and persecution. There is no remedy: "The wicked," says the Holy Ghost, "loathe them that are in the right way"—Prov. xxix. 27. They who walk in the broad road, cannot but feel an abhorrence of them that tread in the narrow way. For the lives of the saints are a continual reproach to sinners, who wish to see all like themselves. Shunning the grates, assisting in choir, observance of silences, detachment from particular friendships, and almost every good work of a fervent religious, will be regarded by the tepid as singularities, or perhaps, as hypocritical acts performed from a motive of acquiring the reputation of a saint. Should a fervent nun, in a convent of relaxed discipline, commit a fault (for she has not ceased to be frail and subject to defects,) should she, for example, yield a word of slight impatience, or sometimes defend herself against an unjust accusation, oh! what an outcry is raised against her! Behold the saint! the tepid exclaim. To impose upon others, she communicates every morning, she always observes silence, she wears hair-cloths, and remains all day in the choir. They sometimes add falsehood to truth. If she wishes to be a saint, she must be careful to suffer, and to offer to God all these reproaches. Unless she submit to them, she will not continue long in the way of perfection; she will soon lose all that she has acquired, and will become as imperfect as the others. In speaking once of a certain religious, who was esteemed a saint, St. Bernard said: "He, indeed, is a saint, but he wants the greatest of all blessings—the reputation of a sinner."

12. Let us then be persuaded, that to be persecuted in this life, confers the highest excellence on the saints. "And," says the Apostle, "all that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution"—2 Tim. iii. 12. The Redeemer says, "If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you"—John xv. 20. Some will say: I attend only to my own concerns, I give offence to no one: why should I be persecuted? But all the saints have been persecuted: Jesus Christ, the head of the saints, has been persecuted: and will you not submit to persecution? But what greater favour, says St. Teresa, can God bestow upon us, than to send us the treatment which he wished his beloved Son to suffer on earth? "Believe me," says Father Torres, in a letter to one of his penitents, "that one of the greatest graces which God can confer upon you, is to make you worthy to be calumniated by all, without being esteemed by any." When then, blessed sister, you see yourself disregarded and despised by all men, rejoice, and thank your spouse, who wishes you to be treated in the same manner in which he himself wished to be treated in this life. And to prepare your soul to accept humiliations when they occur, represent to yourself in the time of meditation all the contempt, contradictions, and persecutions, which may happen to you, and offer yourself, with a strong desire and resolution, to suffer them all for the sake of Jesus Christ, and thus you shall be better prepared to accept them.

13. In the fifth place, you must not only accept humiliations in peace, but must also be glad, and exult under them. "A good religious," says St. Joseph Calasanctius, "despises the world, and rejoices in its scoffs." The venerable Lewis de Ponte could not, at first, conceive how a soul could delight in contempt, but when he became more perfect, he experienced the consolations of abjection. By our own strength we certainly cannot rejoice in humiliations, but by the aid of Jesus Christ we can imitate the Apostles, who "went from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were accounted worthy to suffer reproach for the name of Jesus"—Acts v. 41. "There are some," as St. Joseph Calasanctius says, "who suffer reproach, but not with joy." To teach the perfect spirit of humility to St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, St. Ignatius came down from heaven, and assured her, that true humility consists in taking pleasure in whatever inspires self-contempt.

14. Worldlings do not delight as much in honours as the saints do in contempt. Brother Juniper, of the order of St. Francis, received insults as he would the most costly gems. When derided by his companions, St. John Francis Regis not only rejoiced at but also encouraged their ridicule. Thus, from the lives of the saints, it would appear that sufferings and humiliations were the sole objects of their wishes. With a cross on his shoulder, and a crown of thorns on his head, the Redeemer once appeared to St. John of the Cross, and said: "John, ask of me what thou wilt." "Lord," replied the saint, "I desire to suffer and to be despised for thy sake." As if he said: Lord, seeing you oppressed with sorrow, and saturated with opprobrium for the love of me, what can I ask from you but pains and ignominies? The Lord once assured blessed Angela of Foligno, that the surest means by which a soul can ascertain whether her lights are from God, is to examine if they have inspired and left behind a strong desire of being despised for his sake. Jesus wishes that, under injuries and persecutions, we not only be not disquieted, but that we even rejoice and exult in expectation of the great glory which he has prepared for us in heaven, as the reward of our sufferings. "Blessed are ye when they shall revile and persecute you, * * * be glad and rejoice, for your reward is very great in heaven"—Matt. v. 11, 12.

15. To those who are about to enter religion it is my custom to recommend, above all things, the practice of obedience, and of patience under contempt. I have been anxious to treat the latter at full length, because I am convinced that, without bearing contempt, it is impossible for a nun to advance in perfection; and because I hold as certain, that the religious who cheerfully embraces humilities shall become a Saint. "A soul humble of heart," says St. Paulinus, "is the heart of Christ." The nun who is humble of heart, or who delights in contempt, is transformed into the heart of Jesus Christ. Be assured, then, O blessed sister, that if you are to be a Saint, you must suffer humiliations and contempt. Though all your companions were Saints, you shall, notwithstanding, by the ordination of God, meet with frequent contradictions; you shall be frequently put below others, held in little esteem, and shall have to submit to accusations and reproofs. To render you like himself, Jesus Christ will easily find the means of making you an object of contempt. Hence, I entreat you to practice, every day, the beautiful advice of Father Torres to his penitents. "Say, every day, a Pater and Ave in honour of the life and ignominy of Jesus, and offer yourself to suffer, not only in peace, but even with joy, for the love of him, all the contradictions and reproaches which he will send you, begging always his assistance to be faithful to him in bearing patiently all injuries and humiliations.

PRAYER.

My Jesus, my love, how is it possible that, seeing thee, my God, humbled unto death, and even the ignominious death of the cross, I should be so proud? Ah! through the merits of thy ignominies make me know my miseries and deformities, that I may abhor myself, and suffer in peace, for the love of thee, all the injuries which I shall receive. Ah! my Redeemer, thou hast rendered ignominies amiable to all who love thee. Grant that I may understand thy goodness and thy love, that thus, to please thee, I may love and embrace all manner of contempt. Grant that I may banish from my heart all human respect; and that in all my actions I may seek only thy will and pleasure. I love thee, O my humbled Jesus; and I purpose, with thy grace, not to resent any injuries, nor to complain of any affront which may be offered to me. From thee I hope for strength to fulfil this resolution. Mary, my mother, assist me by thy intercession: pray to Jesus for me. Amen.

CHAPTER XII.

ON FRATERNAL CHARITY.

SECTION I.

On the Charity to be practiced towards one's neighbour, especially in judging their actions.

1. To love God without at the same time loving our neighbour is impossible. The same precept which prescribes love towards God imposes a strict obligation of fraternal charity. "And this commandment we have from God, that he who loveth God, love also his brother"—1 John iv. 21. Hence, St. Thomas teaches, that the love of God and the love of our neighbour proceed alike from charity—2. 2. q. 25, a. 1. For charity makes us love God and our neighbour, because such is the will of God. Such, too, was the doctrine of St. John the Evangelist. St. Jerome relates (com. in. Gal.,) that being asked by his disciples why he frequently recommended fraternal love, that holy apostle replied: "Because it is the precept of the Lord, and the fulfilment of it alone is sufficient." St. Catherine of Genoa once said to the Lord: "My God, Thou dost command me to love my neighbour, and I can love nothing but thee." "My child," answered Jesus "he that loves me loves whatsoever I love." Indeed, when we love any person we also love his relatives, his servants, his likeness, and even his clothes, because we know that he loves them. And why do we love our neighbours? It is because God loves them. Hence, St. John says that "if any man say I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar"—1 John iv. 20. But as hatred towards our brethren is incompatible with the love of God, so an act of charity, performed in their regard, will be accepted by Jesus Christ as if done for himself. "I say unto you," says the Redeemer, "as long as you did it to one of these my brethren you did it to me"—Matt. xxv. 40. St. Catherine of Genoa used to say, "that our love of God is to be measured by our love for our neighbour."

2. But holy charity—the beautiful daughter of God—being banished from the world by the greater part of mankind, seeks an asylum in the monasteries of religious. Oh! what then shall become of the convent from which charity is exiled! As hell is a land of hatred, so paradise is the kingdom of love, where all the blessed love each other, and each one rejoices at the happiness of the rest as at his own. Oh! what a paradise is the convent in which charity reigns! It is the delight of God himself. "Behold," says the Psalmist, "how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity"—Ps. cxxxii. 1. The Lord looks with complacency on the charity of brethren and sisters who dwell together in unity, who are united by one will of serving God, and who seek only to sanctify each other, that they may be all united one day in the land of bliss. The highest praise bestowed by St. Luke on the first Christians was that they had but one heart and one soul. "And the multitude of the believers had but one heart and one soul"—Acts iv. 32. This unity was the fruit of the prayer of Jesus Christ, who, before his passion, besought his Eternal Father to make his disciples one by holy charity, as he and the Father are one. "Holy Father, keep them in thy name, that they may be one as we also are"—John xvii. 11. This unity is one of the principal fruits of redemption, as may be inferred from the prediction of Isaias: "The wolf shall dwell with the lamb; and the leopard shall lie down with the kid—they shall not hurt nor shall they kill in all my holy mountain"—Isaias xi. 6. Yes, the followers of Jesus, though of different countries and of different dispositions, shall live in peace with each other, each seeking by holy charity to accommodate himself to the wishes and inclinations of the others. And, as a certain author has well remarked, what does a community of religious mean but an union of many by will and desire, so as to form but one person. It is charity that maintains union; for it is not possible that all the members of a convent should have congenial dispositions. It is charity that unites their hearts, and makes them bear each other's burdens, and it is charity that makes each conform to the will of the others.

3. St. John Climacus relates, that in the vicinity of Alexandria there was a celebrated monastery where, because they loved each other cordially in holy charity, all the religious enjoyed the peace of paradise. In general, the first who perceived a disagreement between two of the religious was able to restore peace by a mere sign. But if they could not be reconciled, both were sent as exiles to a neighbouring house, and were told at their departure that the abode of two demons in the monastery could be no longer profitable to the community. Oh! how delightful it is to see in a convent of nuns each praise, assist, and serve the others, and all love the others with a true sisterly affection. Nuns are called sisters, because they are not such by blood, but by charity, which should unite them in love more closely than all the ties of flesh and blood. "The nun who has not charity," says St. Jane Chantal, "is a religious in name, but not in reality. She is a sister in dress not in affection." Hence, because they knew that where there is no union there is no God, almost all the founders and foundresses of religious orders have, with their last breath, recommended the practice of holy charity to their spiritual children.

4. "Where," says St. Augustine, "you see the stones of any fabric well bound to the timber, you enter with security, and apprehend no danger"—Serm. 256, de Serm. But were the stones detached from the wood, you would shudder at the very thought of approaching the building. Happy the religious house in which all are united by holy charity: but miserable is the monastery in which disunion and party spirit prevail. "Yes," adds the Saint, "such a monastery is not the tabernacle of the Lord, but the abode of Lucifer; it is a house not of salvation, but of perdition." Of what use are riches and magnificence, a splendid church and beautiful garden, to a monastery from which union and charity are banished? Such a monastery is a hell, where, to prevent the advancement of the rivals, each party decries the other. Suspicions and aversions are always on the increase: they fill the minds, are poured out in conversation, and occupy the thoughts of the religious at mental prayer, at Mass, and at communion. Hence, we may exclaim: O miserable prayers, miserable Masses, miserable communions! In a word, where there is no charity, there is no recollection, no peace, no God. If, blessed sister, factions exist in your convent, prostrate yourself before the Lord, and in his presence pour forth tears of blood and fervent supplications, that by his Almighty hand he may remedy the evil. For when the spirit of faction has crept into the cloister, it can be extinguished only by the arm of Omnipotence. If it be in your power to restore peace, endeavour with all your might, and at all hazards, to accomplish so great a good; but if the extinction of discord be beyond your reach, it is your duty at least to remain neutral, and to shun, as you would death itself, every act which may encourage the fell spirit of faction.

5. Remember, however, that I do not mean to censure those zealous nuns who defend the observance of rule, and who strenuously oppose all abuses. Whoever seeks the good of the community belongs to the party of Jesus Christ. Would to God that all were of this party. If, blessed sister, you ever see an abuse introduced into the convent, I exhort you to unite with the fervent, and never to abstain from vindicating the cause of God, even though you should be left alone: the Lord will reward your efforts for the maintenance of regular observance. To feel careless, and to manifest indifference about the relaxation and neglect of discipline, is neither virtue nor humility, but is the fruit of pusillanimity, tepidity, and of a want of divine love. The religious, then, whom I condemn are those who maintain parties for promoting their own interests or particular friendships, or for depressing a rival, or resenting an insult. From such parties I exhort you to keep aloof, though, in punishment of your neutrality, you should be reproached with ingratitude, wrong-headedness, or baseness of spirit, and even though you should be deprived of office and doomed to perpetual disgrace. To preserve charity and the common peace you must sacrifice all self-interest. When some of the bishops wished to have St. Gregory Nazianzen for patriarch, while others refused to submit to his authority, the Saint, to heal their dissensions, exclaimed: "My brothers, I wish to see you in peace, and if the renunciation of my patriarchal dignity be necessary to preserve harmony among you, I am ready to renounce my see." He then gave up the bishopric of Constantinople, and retired into solitude.

6. But let us speak in particular of the means which a nun should adopt for the maintenance of charity among her sisters in religion. She must follow the advice of the apostle to his disciples: "Put ye on, therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, the bowels of mercy"—Col. iii. 12. As a religious always wears her habit, and as her whole body is covered by it, so in all her actions she must be clothed and encompassed with charity. "Put on the bowels of mercy." A religious should be clothed not only with charity, but with the bowels of charity: that is, she should love each sister as if for her she had the tenderest affection. When a person entertains for others a strong attachment, he rejoices at their prosperity, and grieves at their misfortunes as his own. He labours to promote their happiness, to vindicate their character from any imputation that may be cast upon it, to excuse any fault they may commit, and to extol every good act they may perform. Now, what is the effect of passion in worldlings should be the fruit of holy charity in religious.

7. Be careful always to practice charity in thought as well as in deeds, to all mankind, but particularly to your sisters in religion. To practice charity in thought, you must, in the first place, endeavour to banish all rash judgments, suspicions, and doubts. To entertain a rash doubt regarding another is a defect; to indulge a positive suspicion is a greater fault, and to judge with certainty, without certain grounds, that another has sinned, is still more criminal before God. Whoever judges rashly of his neighbour shall be judged with severity. "Judge not, that you may not be judged. For with that judgment you judge you shall be judged"—Matt. vii. 1, 2. But although it is sinful to judge evil of others, still it is not a violation of divine law to suspect, or even to judge evil of them, when we have certain motives for such suspicions or judgments. However, the safest and most charitable rule is to think well of all, and to banish all such judgments and suspicions. "Charity," says the Apostle, "thinketh no evil"—1 Cor. viii. 5. But this rule is not to be observed by the religious who hold the offices of superior, or of mistress of novices. Because, to prevent evil, it is their duty to suspect whenever there are grounds of suspicion. But if, by your office, you are not charged with the correction of others, endeavour always to judge favourably of all your sisters. St. Jane Chantal used to say that "in our neighbour we should observe what is good." Should you sometimes, through mistake, praise in others what is censurable, you shall never have reason to repent of your error. "Charity," says St. Augustine, "grieves not when she erroneously thinks well of what is evil"—Ps. cxlvii. St. Catherine of Bologna once said: "I have lived for many years in religion, and have never thought ill of any of my sisters; because I know that a person who appears imperfect may be more dear to God than any other whose conduct is much more exemplary." Be careful, then, not to indulge in observing the defects and concerns of others, nor to imitate the example of those who go about asking what others say of them, and thus fill their minds with suspicions, and their hearts with bitterness and aversions. Listen not to them who tell you that others spoke of your defects, and ask not from them the names of those who dispraised you. In such tales there is in general a great deal of exaggeration. Let your conduct be such as deserves praise from all, but regard not what shall be said of you. When told that any one has charged you with a certain fault, let your answer be that others know you but little; and that were they aware of all your defects they would say a great deal more of you; or you may say that God alone is to be your judge.

8. Secondly, when our neighbour is visited with any infirmity, loss, or other calamity, charity obliges us to regret his misfortune, at least with the superior will. I say with the superior will; for concupiscence always appears to take a certain delight in hearing that a calamity has befallen an enemy. But that delight is not culpable as long as it is resisted by the will. Whenever the inferior appetite solicits the will to rejoice at the misfortune of others, pay no more attention to its criminal solicitations than you would to a dog that barks without reason; but endeavour to excite in the superior will sentiments of regret at their distress. It is, indeed, sometimes lawful to rejoice at the good effects which are likely to result from the temporal afflictions of others. For example, it is not forbidden to be glad from a motive of his conversion, or of the cessation of scandal, that a notorious and obstinate sinner has been visited with sickness. However, should he have offended us, the joy occasioned by his infirmity may be the fruit of passion as well as of zeal.

9. Thirdly, charity obliges us to rejoice at a neighbour's good, and to banish envy, which consists in a feeling of regret at the good of others, inasmuch as it is an obstacle to our own. According to St. Thomas, a person may grieve at the good of others in four ways: "First, when he apprehends that their advancement will be detrimental to himself or to others; and if the loss sustained be unjust, his regret is not envy, and may be blameless." "It may often happen," says St. Gregory, "that without losing charity we rejoice at the ruin of an enemy; and that without incurring the guilt of envy we feel sorrow at his exaltation, when by his downfall we think that others will be justly exalted, and when we fear that by his prosperity many will be unjustly oppressed"—Lib. 22, Mor. c. 2. Secondly, when a person grieves, not because others have been prosperous, but because he himself has not been equally successful. This grief is not envy, but is, on the contrary, an act of virtue when it regards spiritual goods. Thirdly, when he regrets the success of others, because he deems them unworthy of it; and this sorrow is not sinful when he believes that the advantages, dignity, or riches which they have acquired will be injurious to their salvation. Fourthly, when a person regrets the prosperity of others, because it is an obstacle to his own advancement: this is envy, and should not be entertained. The wise man says that the envious imitate the devil, who instigated our first parents to sin, because he was grieved to see them destined for that celestial kingdom from which he himself had been expelled. "But," says the wise man, "by the envy of the devil, death came into the world, and they follow him that are of his side"—Wis. ii. 24. But charity makes us regard the happiness or misery of others as we would our own.

PRAYER.

Ah! my Redeemer, how unlike am I to thee! Thou wast all charity towards thy persecutors; I am all rancour and hatred towards my neighbours. Thou prayedst with so much love for those who crucified thee; and I immediately seek revenge against them who offend me. Pardon me, my Jesus; I wish no more to be what I have hitherto been; give me strength to love and to do good to all who injure me. Abandon me not, O Lord, to my passions. Oh! what a hell it would be to me, after having received so many of thy graces, to be again separated from thee, and deprived of thy friendship. For the sake of the blood thou hast shed for me permit not such a separation. Eternal Father, through the merits of thy Son, suffer me not to become thy enemy. Shouldst thou see that I will one day offend thee, take me out of life, now that I hope to be in the state of grace. Oh! God of love, give me thy love! O infinite power, assist me! O infinite mercy, have pity on me! O infinite goodness, draw me entirely to thee! I love thee, O Sovereign Good! O Mother of God, pray to Jesus for me! Thy protection is my hope. Amen.

SECTION II.

On the charity to be practiced in words.

1. To practice fraternal charity in words, you must, in the first place, and above all, abstain from every species of detraction. "The tale-bearer," says the Holy Ghost, "shall defile his own soul, and shall be hated by all"—Eccl. xxi. 31. Yes, he shall be an object of hatred to God and to men, and even to those who, for their own amusement, applaud and encourage his slanderous language. Even they shall shun him; because they justly fear that, as in their presence he has detracted others, so before others he will slander them. St. Jerome says that some who have renounced other vices cannot abstain from detraction. "They who have abandoned other sins continue to fall into the sin of detraction." Would to God that even in the cloister there were not to be found religious whose tongues are so sharp that they cannot speak without wounding the character of a neighbour. Such persons should be banished from all monasteries, or should at least be separated from the society of their sisters. For they disturb the recollection, silence, devotion, and peace of the whole community. In a word, they are the ruin of religious houses. God grant that such uncharitable nuns may not meet the fate of a certain slanderer, who, according to Thomas Cantipratensis, died in a fit of rage, and in the act of lacerating his tongue with his teeth. The tongue of another, who attempted to defame the character of St. Malachy, instantly swelled and became filled with worms. In this miserable state the unhappy slanderer died after seven days.

2. But how dear to God and to man is the man who speaks well of all. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that if she knew any one who had never in his whole life spoken ill of a neighbour, she would have him canonized. Be careful never to utter a word which savours of detraction: be particularly careful to avoid all uncharitableness towards your sisters in religion. But above all, be on your guard against every expression which is in the slightest degree calculated to depress the character of your prelate, abbess, confessor, or any other superior. By speaking ill of them, you would destroy in your companions the spirit of obedience, by diminishing their respect for the judgment and authority of their superiors. Should your language excite a suspicion in the mind of the sisters that the superior is unreasonable in her commands, it will be very difficult to induce them to practice the obedience which is due to her. The sin of detraction is committed, not only by imputing to others what is not true, by exaggerating their defects, or by making known their hidden faults, but also by representing their virtuous actions as defective, or by ascribing them to a bad motive. It is also detraction to deny the good works of others, or to question their claims to the just praise bestowed on them. To render their calumnies more credible, worldlings sometimes begin by praise and end with slander. Such a person, they say, has great deal of talent, but he is proud: he is very generous, but at the same time very vindictive.

3. Let it be your care always to speak well of all. Speak of others as you would wish to be spoken of by others. With regard to the absent, observe the excellent rule of St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi: "Never to utter in their absence what you would not say in their presence." And should you ever hear a sister speak ill of others, be careful neither to encourage her uncharitableness nor to appear pleased with her language, otherwise you shall partake of her guilt. You should either reprove her, or change the subject of conversation, or withdraw from her, or at least pay no attention to her. "Hedge in thy ears with thorns," says the Holy Ghost, "hear not a wicked tongue"—Eccl. xxviii. 28. Against detraction hedge in your ears with thorns that it may not enter. Whenever, then, you hear a person speak ill of others, it is necessary to show, at least by silence, by a gloomy countenance, or by downcast eyes, that you are not pleased with the conversation. Conduct yourself always in such a way that no one will in future dare to attack the character of another in your presence. And when it is in your power, charity requires of you to take the part of the person who is detracted. "Thy lips are as a scarlet lace"—Cant. iv. 3. "My spouse," says the Lord, "I will have thy lips as a scarlet lace;" that is, according to Theodoret, "your words must be full of charity, so as to cover as much as possible the defects of others; or at least to excuse their intention, if their actions be inexcusable." "Excuse the intention," says St. Bernard (ser. 40, in Cant.,) "if you cannot excuse the act." The Abbot Conestabile, as Surius relates (17 Feb.,) was called "The covering of his brethren." For this holy monk, as often as he heard any one speak of the defects of others, sought to cover and excuse them. Such, too, was the practice of St. Teresa; of her the nuns used to say, that "in her presence their character was secure, because she would defend them."

4. Be careful never to mention to any sister that another has spoken ill of her; for tale-bearing of this kind sometimes occasions disputes and aversions, which last for a long time. Oh! how frightful the account which tale-bearers must render to God. The sowers of discord are objects of abomination in His sight. Six things there are which the Lord hateth, and the seventh His soul detesteth. The seventh is the man "that soweth discord among brethren"—Prov. vi. 16 and 19. An uncharitable word, which proceeds from passion, may be excusable. But how can the Almighty bear with a religious who sows discord, and disturbs the peace of a community? Listen to the advice of the Holy Ghost: "Hast thou heard a word against thy neighbour, let it die within thee"—Eccl. xix. 10. The words which you hear of a sister must be not only confined to yourself, but must even die and be buried within you. You must be careful, then, never to give the slightest intimation of what you have heard. For a single word, a nod of the head, a simple hint, may lead others to a knowledge, or at least to a suspicion, of the faults which were mentioned to you. Some appear to suffer the pangs of death until they have disclosed the secrets communicated to them, as if these secrets were so many thorns which wound their very heart until they are drawn out. You should never mention the hidden defects of others to any one except the superiors, and not even to them unless the reparation of the injury done to the community, or the good of the sister herself who has committed the fault, require that her neglect should be known to the superior.

5. Moreover, in your conversation you must be careful never to wound, even by jests, the feelings of a sister. Jests which offend a neighbour are opposed to charity and to the words of Jesus Christ: "All things whatsoever you would that men should do to you, do you also to them"—Matt. vii. 12. You certainly would not like to be made an object of derision and of mockery before your companions; abstain, then, from casting ridicule on others. Endeavour, also, to avoid, as much as possible, all disputes. Sometimes trifles give occasion to arguments, which end in disputes and injurious language. There are some who violate charity by proposing, through the spirit of contradiction, certain topics of debate, which give rise to useless disputation. "Strive not," says the wise man, "in a matter which doth not concern thee"—Eccl. xi. 9. But you will say that in every debate you defend the right side of the question, and that you cannot listen in silence to assertions utterly destitute of foundation. I answer, in the words of Cardinal Bellarmine: "That an ounce of charity is more valuable than a hundred car-loads of reason." In all debates, but particularly when the subject is of little importance, give your opinion, if you wish to join in the conversation; but be careful never to defend it with obstinacy. It is better to give up your own opinion than to enter into a useless, and perhaps dangerous, controversy. Blessed Egidius used to say, that in such controversies to submit is to conquer; because submission evinces a superiority in virtue, and preserves peace. Surely the preservation of peace is of far greater importance than the empty honour of a wordy victory. Hence, St. Ephrem used to say, that "to maintain peace he always yielded to his adversary in disputation." Hence, also, St. Joseph Calasanctius advises "all who desire peace never to contradict any one."

6. If you love charity endeavour to be affable and meek to all. Meekness is the characteristic virtue of the lamb; it is the beloved virtue of Jesus Christ, who, through a love of meekness, took the appellation of Lamb. In your conversation and intercourse with others, be agreeable, not only to the superior and to those who are in office, but to all, and particularly to the sisters who have offended you, who oppose your wishes, or displease you by their roughness of manner, or by their forgetfulness of past favours. "Charity is patient; beareth all things." Whoever, then, bears not the defects of his neighbour cannot have true charity. The most perfect souls are not free from all defects. You yourself are subject to faults; and notwithstanding your manifold imperfections you expect to be treated with charity and compassion. You, therefore, should, according to the advice of the Apostle, compassionate the defects of others. "Bear ye one another's burdens"—Gal. vi. 2. A mother, because she loves them, submits in patience to the insolence of her children. It is by the manner in which you bear the burdens of your sisters that you are to judge whether you love them with true charity, which, because it is supernatural, should be stronger than natural affection. Oh! with what charity did the Redeemer bear with the rudeness and imperfections of his disciples during the whole time that he lived with them. With what charity did he wash the feet of the traitor Judas? With what patience has he borne, even to the present moment, with your sinfulness and ingratitude? And will you refuse to bear with the defects of your sisters? The physician, while he loves a patient, loathes his disease; and if you have charity, you must love your sisters, and, at the same time, hate their faults. But you will say: What am I to do? I have a natural repugnance to the society of such a sister, and feel it painful to hold intercourse with her. My answer is, have more fervour and more charity, and all such antipathies will vanish.

7. Let us come to practice. In the first place, endeavour with all your might to restrain every motion of anger. In the next place, you must be careful to abstain from all disagreeable words, and to avoid all roughness and haughtiness of manner; for rude conduct is sometimes more offensive than insulting language. Should a sister ever treat you with contempt, suffer it in patience for the love of Jesus Christ, who for the love of you, has borne with far greater insults. My God! what misery to see certain religious, who practice mental prayer and frequent the sacraments, so sensitive to every mark of disrespect or inattention! Sister Mary of the Ascension, as often as she received an affront, went immediately before the holy sacrament, and said: "My spouse, I bring you this little present; I beg you to accept it, and to pardon the person by whom I have been offended." Why do you not imitate the holy religious? To preserve charity you must suffer all things. Father Alvarez used to say, that virtue is weak till it is proved by maltreatment from others. It is by the manner in which she bears with contempt and insult that a soul shows whether she abounds or fails in charity.

8. Should any one ever address you in the language of passion, or even of insult and reproach, answer with sweetness, and her anger will be instantly appeased. "A mild answer breaketh wrath"—Prov. xv. 1. St. John Chrysostom says: "Fire cannot be extinguished by fire, nor wrath by anger"—Hom. 98, in Gen. Do you imagine that by replying with acrimony to all who speak to you in anger you will calm passion? On the contrary, you will provoke it, and will also violate charity. Let your answer to every word of anger be full of sweetness, and the fire of passion will be instantly extinguished. Sophronius relates, that "two monks having missed their way on a journey entered by chance into a field in which seed had been just sown. The man who was intrusted with the care of the field burst into a fit of rage, and heaped upon them every epithet of reproach. At first they were silent, but seeing that their silence served only to inflame his anger, they exclaimed: 'Brother, we have done wrong; for God's sake pardon us.' This humble answer calmed his passion, and filled his soul with sorrow for his conduct. He immediately asked pardon of the monks for his injurious language—he even left the world and joined them in the cloister."

9. You will sometimes think it right, and even necessary, to repress by a sharp answer the forwardness of a sister, particularly if you are superior, and she be wanting in respect to you; be assured that such sharpness proceeds from passion rather than from reason. I know that anger is sometimes lawful. "Be angry," says the Psalmist, "and sin not"—Ps. iv. 5. But to be angry, and not to sin, is very difficult in practice. Whoever abandons himself to anger exposes his soul to imminent danger. Hence, St. Francis de Sales wisely teaches, in his "Philothea" (part

3, chap. 8,) that however just the occasions of anger may be, its motions should be repressed. "It is better," says the saint, "to have it said of you that you are never angry, than that you were justly angry." St. Augustine says, that "anger once allowed to enter the soul is banished with difficulty;" and therefore he strongly recommends us to stifle it in its very origin. A certain philosopher, called Agrippinus, having lost his property, said: "If I have lost my goods, I will not lose my peace." Let such be your language as often as you receive any offence. Is it not enough for you to have received an affront? do you wish moreover to lose the peace of your soul by yielding to anger? The disturbance of mind occasioned by anger will be far more injurious to you than the insult which you have received. St. Augustine says, that "he who yields to passion on every occasion of insult is his own chastiser." Disquiet of soul, even when it arises from regret for a fault, is always injurious. For, as St. Lewis Gonzaga used to say, "it delights the devil to fish in troubled water."

10. I have said that when a sister speaks to you in the language or tone of passion or contempt, you should answer her with sweetness. But I now say, that whenever the soul is disturbed it is better to be silent; for passion will then make harsh expressions appear just and reasonable. But when peace returns, you will see that your language was altogether unjustifiable. "Turbatus præ ira," says St. Bernard, "oculus rectum non videt"—Lib. 2, de con. c. 11. Anger draws over the soul a dark veil, which renders her incapable of distinguishing what is right from what is wrong.

11. When a sister who has offended you comes to ask pardon, be careful not to receive her with a stern countenance, nor to show discontent or want of respect by your words or looks. If you give signs of dissatisfaction you will violate charity, you will confirm the sister in her dislike towards you, and will give great scandal to the whole community. You must, then, receive her with affection; and if, through humility, she fall on her knees to ask pardon, you should likewise go on your knees and say to her: O my sister, why should you ask pardon of me? You know how much I love and esteem you. I ask pardon for having displeased you by my ignorance and negligence, and by my want of attention to you. Have pity, then, on me, and forgive me.

12. But whenever you offend or displease a sister, endeavour at once by all means in your power to make satisfaction to her, and to remove from her heart all feelings of aversion towards you. St. Bernard says, "that humility alone is the reparation of wounded charity." Self-humiliation is the most efficacious means of repairing the violation of charity. Whenever, then, you offend against charity, humble yourself immediately, overcome by force your natural repugnance to humiliation: the longer you defer the reparation of the fault you have committed, the more your repugnance to make reparation will increase. "If," says the Redeemer, "thou offer thy gift at the altar, and there thou remember that thy brother hath anything against thee, leave there thy offering before the altar, and go first to be reconciled to thy brother, and then coming thou shalt offer thy gift"—Matt. v. 23. If you come to the altar to offer your gift, to receive the holy Eucharist, or to assist at Mass, and remember that you have offended a brother, retire from the altar and be reconciled with him. However, if you think that by asking pardon of the sister you have offended you will only renew her anguish, it is better to wait for a more convenient opportunity, or to ask pardon through another sister. But you must, in the mean time, show her particular attention and respect.

PRAYER.

O my God, look not on my sins, but on Jesus, thy Son, who has sacrificed his life for my salvation. For the sake of Jesus, have pity on me, and pardon all the offences I have given thee, but especially those which I have committed by my want of charity to my neighbour. Destroy in me, O Lord, whatever displeases thee, and give me a sincere desire to please thee in all things. Ah! my Jesus, my greatest sorrow arises from a conviction that I have been so long in the world, and have loved thee so little. Ah! give me a portion of that sorrow which thou didst feel for my sins in the garden of Gethsemani. Oh! that I had died before I offended thee. It consoles me, however, to know that thou givest me time to love thee. I desire to spend all that remains of my life in thy love. I love thee O infinite good; I love thee, the only love of my soul. Ah! make me entirely thine before I die. Draw all my affections to thy love, so that I may never love any object but thee. But while I live I am in danger of losing thee. When shall I be able to say, O my Jesus, that I can never lose thee again! O Jesus, unite me to thee, so that I can never be separated from thee. Grant me this favour, through the love with which thou lovedst me on the cross.

O most holy Virgin, thou art most dear to God—he denies thee nothing: obtain for me the grace never more to offend him, and to love him with my whole heart. I ask no other favour of thee. Amen.

SECTION III.

On the charity to be practiced in works, and towards whom it is to be practiced.

1. Lastly, with regard to the charity which you ought to practice in works, endeavour to be always ready to assist your sisters in all their necessities. Some religious say that they sincerely and affectionately love all their sisters, but they will not submit to inconvenience for the sake of any of them. "My little children, let us not love in word nor in tongue, but in deed and in truth"—1 John iii. 18. To fulfil the precept of charity it is not enough to love our neighbour in words, we must love him in deed. "The just are merciful," says the wise man—Prov. xiii. 13. All the Saints were full of charity and compassion to all who required their assistance. It is related of St. Teresa that she was accustomed to perform every day some act of charity towards her sisters: and whenever she was unable to do it by day she was careful to do it by night, at least by showing light to the sisters who passed in the dark before her cell.—Ribera in vita, lib. 4, cap. 11. Give alms as often as it is in your power. The Scripture says, that alms deliver a soul from death: that it purifies her from sin, and obtains for her the divine mercy and eternal salvation. "For alms," says Tobias, "delivereth from death, and the same is that which purgeth away sins, and maketh to find mercy and life everlasting"—Tobias xii. 9. St. Cyprian says, that "the Lord commands nothing more frequently than the constant practice of alms"—St. Cyp. de Eleem. in Ev.

2. By alms-deeds I mean, not only the distribution of money or of temporal goods, but every species of relief given to a neighbour who stands in need of our assistance. "He that hath the substance of this world," says St. John, "and shall see his brother in need, how doth the charity of God abide in him?"—1 c. iii. v. 17. When a religious assists her companion in her labours she performs an act of charity very pleasing in the sight of God. St. Theodora endeavoured to assist all her sisters in performing the duties of their office, but was careful never to seek assistance from any one in the discharge of her own duties. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi not only assisted her sisters in their most laborious duties, but also offered to perform by herself alone every work which required extraordinary labour. Hence, it was a common saying in the convent, that she laboured more than four lay sisters. Endeavour as much as possible to imitate her conduct, and when you are overcome by fatigue, look on your spouse carrying his cross, and embrace with joy any new labour which your duties may require. The aid which you shall receive from God will be proportioned to the assistance which you will give to your companions. "And with what measure you mete," says Jesus Christ, "it shall be measured to you again"—Matt. vii. 2. Hence, St. Chrysostom says, "that the practice of charity is a powerful means of obtaining great graces from God." "Alms," says the saint, "is the most lucrative of all arts." St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that she felt more happy during the time she assisted her neighbour, than when she was wrapt up in contemplation. "Because," says the saint, "when I am wrapt in contemplation, God assists me, but when I relieve a neighbour I assist God." The Redeemer has declared, that you should not expect either thanks or recompense. You should even rejoice when you receive for your kindness no other reward than inattention and reproach. For then you will have double profit. It is an act of charity to accede to the reasonable requests of others. But should a sister ask you to leave your devotions, in order to amuse her by your conversation, you ought to refuse her request, and attend to your devotions. Charity is well ordered. "He set in order charity in me"—Cant. ii. 4, says the spouse in the Canticles. Hence, whatever injures your own spiritual progress, or that of a sister in religion, is not charity.

3. The most perfect charity consists in zeal for your neighbour's spiritual good. To relieve the spiritual necessities of a fellow-man, or to contribute to his spiritual welfare, as far excels the exercise of charity towards his body, as the dignity of the soul transcends the lowly condition of the flesh. Charity towards the soul is practiced, in the first place, by correcting our neighbour's faults—St. James, E. v. 20. "He who causeth a sinner to be converted from the error of his way, shall save his soul from death, and shall cover a multitude of sins." But, on the other hand, St. Augustine says, that he who sees a brother destroying his soul, by giving way to anger against a neighbour, or by insulting him, and neglects to correct him, sins more grievously by his silence, than the other does by his insults and contumely. "You," says the saint, "see him perish and care not; your silence is more criminal than his reproachful language"—De verbo. Dom. Ser. 16, cap. 4. Do not excuse yourself by saying that you know not how to correct him. St. Chrysostom tells you, that for correcting the faults of others, charity is more needed than wisdom. Make the correction at a seasonable time, with charity and sweetness, and it will be profitable. If you are a superior, you are bound by your office to correct the sisters, if not, you are bound in charity to administer correction as often as you expect fruit from it. Would it not be cruelty in him, who should see a blind man walking into a precipice, not to admonish him of his danger, and thus rescue him from temporal death. But it would be still greater cruelty in you to neglect, when able, to deliver a sister from eternal death. If you prudently judge that your advice would be unprofitable, be careful, at least, to make known that fault to the superior, or to some other person who will be able to apply a remedy. Do not say: This is not my business, I will not take any trouble about it. This was the language of Cain. "Am I," said he, "my brother's keeper?"—Gen. iv. 9. It is the duty of every one, when able, to save his neighbour from ruin. "And," says Ecclesiasticus, "he gave every one of them a commandment concerning his neighbour"—xvii. 12.

4. St. Philip Neri says, that when necessary, God wishes that we omit mental prayer in order to assist a neighbour, particularly in his spiritual necessities. St. Gertrude desired one day to entertain herself in prayer, but a work of charity was to be performed, and, therefore, the Lord said to her: "Tell me, Gertrude, do you intend that I should serve you, or that you should serve me?"—Vita, c. 5. "If," says St. Gregory, "you tend to God, take care not to come alone to him"—Hom. 6. in Evang. And St. Augustine says, "If you love God, draw all to the love of God"—Ps. xxxiii. If you love God, you should take care not to be alone in loving him, but should labour to bring to his love all your relatives, and sisters in religion. Ah! how a holy nun can sanctify the whole community by her words, by her example, by performing her exercises of devotion, with a view to induce others to do the same. Be not afraid of vain-glory. Actions which have nothing extraordinary in them, but which become every religious that tends to perfection, according to her obligation, ought to be performed, even with the intention of given good example, and of drawing the sisters nearer to God. "So let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven"—Matt. v. 16. Hence, to appear devout, mortified, observant of rule, devoted to mental prayer and to frequent communion, in order to give good example to the others sisters, is not an act of vanity, but an act of charity very pleasing to God.

5. Endeavour then to assist all, according to the best of your ability, by words, by works, and particularly by prayers. Every spouse of Jesus Christ should have zeal for his honour, as he himself said to St. Teresa, when he called her his spouse. "Henceforth, as a true spouse, you shall be zealous for my honour"—In Festo Noc. 2. If the spouse of Jesus Christ do not take his part, who will take it? Many doctors, along with St. Basil, teach that by the words, "Amen, I say to you, if you ask the Father anything in my name, he will give it you"—John xvi. 3, Jesus Christ promises to hear our prayers, and not only for ourselves, but also for others, provided they do not place a positive obstacle in the way. Hence, in the common prayer, in your thanksgiving after communion, and your visits to the blessed sacrament, you should never omit to recommend to God all poor sinners, infidels, and heretics, and all who live without God. How pleasing to Jesus Christ are the prayers of his spouse for sinners. He once said to the venerable sister Seraphina de Capri: "Assist me, O my daughter, to save souls by your prayers." To Mary Magdalene de Pazzi he said: "See, Magdalene, how Christians are in the hands of the devil, unless my elect, by their prayers, deliver them, they shall be devoured." Hence, the Saint used to say to her religious: "My sisters, God has not separated us from the world for our own good only, but also for the benefit of sinners." And on another occasion she said: "My sisters, we have to render to God an account of so many lost souls: had we recommended them to God with fervour, perhaps they would not be damned." Hence, we read in her life, that she did not allow an hour of her life to pass without praying for sinners. The great servant of God, sister Stephana de Sancino, for forty years performed severe penances, and offered them all for sinners. Oh! how many souls are sometimes converted, not so much by the sermons of priests as by the prayers of religious! It was once revealed to a preacher, that the fruit which he produced was not the effect of his sermons, but of the prayers of a brother who assisted him at the pulpit. Be careful, also, to pray for priests, that they may labour with true zeal for the salvation of souls.

6. Do not neglect to pray for the souls in purgatory. It is not only a counsel but also (as a learned author says) a duty of holy charity to pray for these holy souls, who stand in great need of our prayers. St. Thomas teaches that

Christian charity extends not only to the living but also to all who have died in the state of grace. Hence, as we are bound to relieve our living neighbours who require our aid, so we are obliged to succour these holy prisoners. According to St. Thomas, their sufferings surpass all the pains of this life. They stand in need of our assistance, because they cannot assist themselves. A certain Cistercian monk appeared after death to the sacristan of his monastery, and said to him: "Assist me by your prayers, for I can obtain nothing for myself"—Istor. del. ord. Cis. If all the faithful ought to assist these holy souls, how much more are religious, placed by God in monasteries, which are so many houses of prayer, bound to succour them by their suffrages. Be carful, then, to recommend to God, every day, in all your prayers, these spouses of the Saviour, who ask your assisttance. Be not unwilling to offer for them some fasts and other mortifications. Above all, apply to them the Masses which you hear, for this affords great relief to these holy souls who, even in their prison, cannot be ungrateful, and will not fail to obtain great graces for us from God, and still greater when they shall be admitted into heaven.

7. From what has been already said, you see how much you stand in need of the virtue of charity, in order to be a saint, and even to be saved. You must practice this charity towards all your neighbours, but particularly to the sisters of your monastery. If you lived in a desert, this virtue would not be so necessary. For, to become a saint in the solitude of a desert, it would be sufficient to attend to prayer and penance. But if you have not great charity towards those with whom you live in the cloister, you will commit a thousand defects every day, and will perhaps be lost. Were a vessel in the midst of the ocean tossed by a violent tempest, surely the persons on board would think only of saving each other from shipwreck. Imagine that God has placed you in this monastery as in a ship, where it is your duty to assist each other to escape the shipwreck of eternal death, and to reach heaven, where you hope to be united for eternity in praising God.

8. Be particularly careful to practice charity towards the sick, whether they are choir nuns or lay sisters. Father D. Anthony Torres used to say: "If you wish to know whether the spirit of God reigns in a community, ask how the sick are treated." Hence, when superior, although of a most amiable disposition, he punished with severity the person who had care of the sick, whenever he was wanting in charity towards them. Oh! how pleasing to God is charity towards the sick! All religious who tend to perfection practice this charity either in choir or in the cells of the sick. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, even though not infirmarian, never omitted (when it was in her power) to assist and serve the sick; and she would say that she desired always to live in an hospital, in order to be always employed in an office so pleasing to God. Let it be remembered that the merit of serving the sick is far greater than the merit of serving those who are in health. First, because the sick stand in greater need of assistance. They sometimes find themselves abandoned by all; sometimes tormented by pains, by melancholy, and by fears. Oh! how pleasing it is to God to labour to console them in that state of affliction. There is greater merit also, because there are greater inconveniences in serving them: in their rooms you find a disagreeable smell, and the gloom of melancholy. Be careful, then, when it is in your power, never to omit to visit a sick companion, even though she be the meanest lay sister in the monastery. To the lay sisters you should pay special attention, for they are generally the most abandoned, particularly when their illness is of long duration. Console them, serve them, and even bring them an occasional little present. Do not look for thanks; but bear with their complaints, impatience, and rudeness. The Lord will reward the charity you practice towards them. It is related in the Chronicles of the Teresians, that St. Isabella of the Angels was seen ascending to heaven immediately after her death, carried by angels, amid great splendour. And she said to a religious to whom she appeared, that God had bestowed that great glory upon her, on account of her charity towards the sick.

9. Lastly, I recommend you above all to practice charity towards the sisters who are opposed to you. I am grateful, such a nun says, to all who treat me with kindness. But I cannot bear acts of ingratitude. "But," as Jesus Christ says, "the infidels are grateful to their benefactors. Christian virtue consists in wishing well to those who hate and injure us." "But I say to you," says Jesus Christ, "love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that persecute and calumniate you"—Matt. v. 44, 45. What a horrible thing must it be in a religious, who makes mental prayer every day, and communicates frequently, to entertain aversion or rancour towards a sister! She is even not ashamed to show it, and when she hears others speak of the sister, she endeavours to lessen their esteem for her whenever she can. If she meet the sister, she does not salute her; if the sister speak to her, she turns away. She turns away from a sister, and God turns his back on her. Consider how the Lamb of God must reward such a tiger of hell. But poor and miserable is the nun who lives in a monastery with hatred in her heart! She shall suffer a hell here, and another hereafter; she endures, even in this life, the punishment of the damned, because she is constrained to live always with a person whom she cannot bear to see.

10. But father (she replies,) this sister is impertinent, it is impossible to bear with her. But it is in bearing with those who are unbearable, that the virtue of charity consists. She lessens your character, she thwarts your designs, she even takes away your reputation, but you, as if perfectly ignorant of her conduct, should force yourself not to show the smallest alienation or coldness: whenever occasion requires, speak to her with a serene countenance. If she appear distant with you, salute her before she salutes you, and endeavour to gain her by sweetness. To act in this manner is not baseness, but the most heroic action which you can perform, because it is very pleasing to God. Do not say that her conduct is unreasonable: listen to what St. Teresa says: "Let her who wishes to bear the cross only when it is reasonable, return to the world, where such reasons are admitted." The reason which ought to prevail with you, is to practice charity in order to please God, though you shall die of pain.

11. Should the sister go so far as to do you a positive injury, take revenge on her; but let it be the revenge of the saints. What is the revenge of the saints? St. Paulinus answers, that "to love an enemy is heavenly revenge." The saints have taken revenge, by loving, praising, and doing good to all who have done them evil. St. Catherine performed, for a long time, the offices of a servant for a woman confined by sickness, who had charged the saint with a sin against chastity. St. Acaius sold his goods in order to relieve a man who had taken away his reputation. St. Ambrose assigned to an assassin, who made an attempt on his life, a daily sum, sufficient to enable him to live comfortably. Venustanus, governor of Tuscany, through hatred of the faith, ordered the hands of St. Sabinus, bishop, to be cut off. The tyrant feeling a violent pain in one of his eyes, prayed the saint to apply a remedy. The saint offered a prayer to God, and raising his arm, still streaming blood, blessed the tyrant, restored his health, and saved his soul: for, entering into himself at the sight of the miracle, the governor was converted to the faith. St. Chrysostom relates, that St. Meletius, seeing the people prepared to stone to death the governor who conducted him to exile, stretched his arms over him, and thus saved his life. Segneri also relates, that in Bologna there was a lady whose only son was murdered: the murderer came into her house, in order to escape the officers of justice. What did she do? She concealed him from them; and said to him: Since I have lost my son, you shall henceforth be my son and heir: take this sum of money, and save yourself elsewhere; for here your life is not secure.—Chr. Ins. p. 1, disc. 20, n. 20. In answer to such examples, some one may say: these have been saints; I have not strength to imitate their example. Let St. Ambrose answer for me: if you have not strength, ask it of God, and he will give it. "If," says the saint, "you are weak, pray: you pray, and God protects you."

12. He who pardons those who have offended him is secure of forgiveness from God, who says: "Forgive and you shall be forgiven"—Luke vi. 37. B. Batista, of Verona, a Franciscan nun, used to say: "Were I to raise the dead to life, I would not be so certain of being loved by God as I am when I feel inclined to do good to them who have done me evil." Our Lord said to B. Angela, of Foligno: The strongest proof of a mutual love between me and my servants is the love which they bear to the person who has offended them. If, then, you can do nothing else, at least pray for all who have offended and persecuted you; and recommend them fervently to God, that you may fulfil the command of Jesus Christ: "Pray for them that persecute and calumniate you." Blessed Jane of the Cross prayed continually for those who gave her any displeasure. Hence her sisters in religion used to say: whoever desires the prayers of mother Jane must offer some insult to her. St. Elizabeth, Queen of Hungary, after having prayed for a person who had offended her, heard from God the following words: Know that you never said a prayer more acceptable to me than that which you have just offered; and on account of this prayer I pardon all your sins. Imitate her example, and you shall certainly obtain the pardon and affection of your divine spouse.

PRAYER.

My Jesus, grant me the gift of thy love, which will make me embrace all pains and insults in order to please thee: give me strength to deny myself all things which are not pleasing to thee, and to accept all things that are disagreeable to self-love—sorrows, persecutions, loss of relatives, of health, of self-esteem, and all the crosses which shall come from thee. I now accept all from thy hand: I accept all the troubles of my life, and especially the pains of my death. Grant that I may live only to please thee; and that at death I may sacrifice my life to thee, with all the affection of my soul. My God, thou dost command me not to offend thee; and I dread an offence against thee more than death. Thou dost command me to love thee, and I desire only to love thee. But I know my weakness. Ah! assist me continually with thy grace: do not leave me in my own hands; if thou dost I will betray thee again. I love thee, O my Sovereign good, and I hope always to love thee. O Mary, my hope, and my mother, obtain for me the grace to be faithful to God, and to love him as a God of infinite goodness deserves to be loved.

CHAPTER XIII.

ON PATIENCE.

SECTION I.

On patience in general.

1. "Patience hath a perfect work"—James i. 4. Patience is a perfect sacrifice which we offer to God, because in suffering tribulations and contradictions we do nothing but accept from his hands the cross which he sends us. "A patient man is better than the valiant"—Prov. xvi. 32. He who suffers with patience is better than a valiant man. Some are resolute and courageous in promoting and supporting a pious undertaking, but are not patient in bearing adversity: it would be better for them to be valiant in patience than in the works which they undertake. The earth is a place of merits, and therefore it is not a place of repose, but of toils and pains; for merits are acquired, not by rest, but by suffering. All who live here below (whether saints or sinners) must suffer. Some are in want of one comfort, others of another: some have nobility but have not property; others abound in riches but want nobility; others enjoy nobility and wealth but have not health. In a word, all, even sovereigns, have occasions to suffer; and because they are the most exalted of mortals, their cares and troubles are the most harassing and perplexing. All our good, then, consists in bearing the cross with patience. Hence the Holy Ghost admonishes us not to assimilate ourselves to senseless beasts, that break out into a rage when they are unable to indulge their appetites. "Do not become like the horse and the mule who have not understanding"—Ps. xxxi. 9. What other advantage than to double our misfortunes can we ever derive from giving way to impatience in contradictions? The good and the bad thief both died on the cross, and suffered the same pains; but because the one embraced them with patience he was saved; and because the other bore them with impatience he was damned. "Una eademque tunseo," says St. Augustine, "bonus perducit ad gloriam, malos redigit in favillum." The same affiiction sends the just to glory, because they accept it with peace, and the wicked to fire, because they submit to it with impatience.

2. It often happens that a person who flies from a cross which God sends him meets with another far more afflicting. "They," says Job, "that fear the hoary frost, the snow shall fall upon them"—Job vi. 16. They who shun the hoar frost shall be covered with snow. Such a nun may say: give me any other office, but take from me the one which I hold. But she shall suffer much more in the second office than in the first, and with little or no merit. Be careful not to imitate her: embrace the fatigue and tribulation which God sends you, for you shall thus acquire greater merit and shall have less to suffer: you will, at least, suffer with peace, knowing that your sufferings come not from self-will, but from the will of God. Let us be persuaded of the truth of what St. Augustine says, that the whole life of a Christian must be a continual cross. "Tota Christiani vita crux est"—Serm. 31, de Sanct. The life of religious who wish to become saints must in a special manner be a continued series of crosses. St. Gregory Nazianzen says that these noble souls place their riches in poverty, their glory in contempt, and their delights in the voluntary privation of earthly pleasures. Hence, St. John Climacus asks: who is truly religious? It is, he says, "the nun that offers continual violence to herself:" and when shall this violence cease? When, answers St. Prosper, life shall have an end. "Tunc finienda pugna quando succedet victoria"—De vita contempt. Then shall the battle cease when the conquest of the eternal kingdom shall be obtained. If you remember hitherto to have offended God, and if you desire to be saved, you should be consoled when you see that God sends you occasions of suffering. St. Chrysostom writes: "Sin is an ulcer, and chastisement a medicinal iron: therefore the sinner if left unpunished is most miserable"—Hom. 6, ad. pop. ant. Sin is an imposthume of the soul: if tribulation do not come to extract the putrid humour, the soul is lost. Miserable the sinner who is not punished after his sin in this life.

3. Be persuaded, then, says St. Augustine, that when the Lord sends you suffering he acts as a physician; and that the tribulation which he sends you is not the punishment of your condemnation, but a remedy for your salvation. "Let man understand," says the holy doctor, "that God is a physician, and that tribulation is a medicine for salvation, not a punisment for damnation." Hence, you ought to thank God when he chastises you; for his chastisements are a proof that he loves you, and receives you into the number of his children. "Whoever the Lord loveth," says St. Paul, "he chastiseth; and he scourgeth every son whom he receiveth"—Heb. xii. 6. Hence, St. Augustine: "Gaudes agnosce patrem blandientem: tribularis? agnosce patrem emendantem"—In Ps. 148. Do you enjoy consolation? acknowledge a father who caresses you: are you in tribulation? recognise a parent who corrects you. On the other hand, the same holy doctor says: "Unhappy you, if after you have sinned God exempts you from scourges in this life. It is a sign that he excludes you from the number of his children: "Si excestus es a passione flagellorum exceptus es a numero filiorum"—Lib. de pass. c. 5. Say not, then, for the future, when you find yourself in tribulation, that God has forgotten you: say rather that you have forgotten your sins. He who knows that he has offended God must pray with St. Bonaventure: Run, O Lord, run and wound thy servants with sacred wounds, lest they be wounded with the wounds of death"—Stim. de div. am. c. 3. Run, O Lord, and wound thy servant with the wounds of love and salvation, that they may escape the wounds of thy wrath and of eternal death.

4. Let us rest assured that God sends us crosses, not for our perdition but for our salvation: if we know not how to turn them to our own profit, it is entirely our own fault. Explaining the words, "the house of Israel is become dross to me, all these are ..... iron and lead in the midst of the furnace"—Ezech. xxii. 18, St. Gregory says: "as if God should say, 'I wished to purify them by the fire of tribulation, and sought to make them gold, but in the furnace they have become to me iron and lead'"—Past. p. 3. I have endeavoured by the fire of tribulation to change them into gold, but they have been converted into lead. These are the sinners who, after having several times deserved hell, when visited with any calamity, break out into impatience and anger; they always wish to treat God as if he were guilty of injustice and tyranny, and even go so far as to say: "But, O Lord, I am not the only one who has offended thee; it appears that I am the only person whom thou chastisest: I am weak, I have not strength to bear so great a cross." Miserable man, alas! what do you say? You say to God, I am not the only one who has offended you. If others have offended God, he will punish them also in this life, if he wishes to show mercy to them; but do you not know that, according to the words which God himself spoke by Ezechiel, "My indignation shall rest in thee, and my jealousy shall depart from thee, and ..... I will be angry no more" (xvi. 42,) the greatest chastisement which God can inflict on sinners is not to chastise them on this earth? I have no more zeal for your soul, and therefore as long as you live you shall nevermore feel my anger. But St. Bernard says, "God's anger is greatest when he is not angry. I wish, O Father of mercies, that thou mayest be angry with me"—Serm. 43, in Cant. God's wrath against sinners is greatest when he is not angry with them, and abstains from chastising them. Hence the saint prayed the Lord, saying: Lord, I wish you to treat me with the mercy of the Father of mercies, and therefore I wish that you chastise me here for my sins, and thus save me from your everlasting vengeance. Do you say, "I have not strength to bear this cross." But if you have not strength, why do you not ask it of God? He has promised to give his aid to all who pray for it: "Ask, and it shall be given you"—Matt. vii. 7.

5. When you, O blessed sister, are visited by God with any infirmity, or loss, or persecution, humble yourself, and say with the good thief: "We receive the due reward of our deeds"—Luke xxiii. 41. Lord, I deserve this cross, because I have offended you. Humble yourself and be comforted: for the chastisement which you receive is a proof that God wishes to pardon the eternal punishment due to your sins. "Who will grant me," says Job, "..... that this may be my comfort, that afflicting me with sorrow he spare not"—vi. 10. Let this be my consolation, that the Lord may afflict me, and may not spare me here below, in order to spare me hereafter. O God! how can he who has deserved hell complain if the Lord send him a cross. Were the pains of hell trifling, still, because they are eternal, we should gladly exchange them for all temporal sufferings which have an end. But no; in hell there are all kinds of pain—they are all intense and everlasting. And though you should have preserved baptismal innocence, and have never deserved hell, you have at least merited a long purgatory: and do you know what purgatory is? St. Thomas says (in 4 sent. dist. 21,) that "the souls in purgatory are tormented by the very fire which tortures the damned." Hence, St. Augustine says, that "the pain of that fire surpasses every torment which man can suffer in this life." "Gravior erit ille ignis quam quodquod potest homo pati in hac vita"—Ps. 37. Be content, then, to be chastised in this life rather than in the next; particularly since, by accepting crosses with patience in this life, your sufferings shall be meritorious; but hereafter you shall suffer without merit.

6. Console yourself also in suffering, with the hope of paradise. St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say: "To gain heaven all labour is small." And before him the Apostle said: "The sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the glory to come, that shall be revealed in us"—Rom. viii. 18. It would be but little to suffer all the pains of this earth for the enjoyment of a single moment in heaven; how much more, then, ought we to embrace the crosses which God sends us, when we know that the short sufferings of this life will merit for us an eternal felicity. "That which is at present momentary and light of our tribulation worketh for us ..... an eternal weight of glory"—2 Cor. iv. 17. We should feel not sadness, but consolation of spirit, when God sends us sufferings here below. They who pass to eternity with the greatest merits shall receive the greatest reward. It is on this account that the Lord sends us tribulations. Virtues, which are the fountains of merits, are practiced only by acts; they who have the most frequent occasions of annoyance make the most frequent acts of patience; they who are most frequently insulted, make most frequent acts of meekness. Hence, St. James says, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he had been proved he shall receive the crown of life"—i. 12. Blessed is he who suffers afflictions with peace; for when he shall be thus proved he shall receive the crown of eternal life.

7. This thought made St. Agapitus, martyr, a boy of fifteen years, say, when the tyrant ordered his head to be encompassed with burning coals, "It is very little to bear the burning of my head, which shall be crowned with glory in heaven. This thought made Job exclaim: "If we have received good things at the hand of God, why should we not receive evil?"—Job ii. 10. He meant to say, if we have gladly received good things, why should we not also receive, with greater joy, temporal evils, by which we shall acquire the eternal goods of paradise? This thought also filled with jubilation the hermit whom a soldier found singing in a wood, though his body was covered with ulcers, so that his flesh was falling in pieces. The soldier said to him. "Is it you that were singing?" "Yes, I sang, and I had reason to sing; for between me and God there is nothing but the filthy wall of my body. I now see it falling in pieces, and therefore I sing, because I see that the time is at hand when I shall go to enjoy my Lord"—(In Spec. exemp. dist. 9, ex. 139.) This thought made St. Francis of Assisium say: "So great is the good which I expect that to me every pain gives delight." In a word, the saints feel consoled when they see themselves in tribulation, and are afflicted when they enjoy earthly consolations. We read in the Teresian Chronicles that in reciting these words of the Office, "Quando consolaberis me?" "When wilt thou comfort me?"—Ps. cxviii. 82, Mother Isabella of the Angels used to say them so fast that she would anticipate the other sisters. Being asked why she did so, she answered: "I am afraid that God may console me in this life."

8. To be in tribulation in this world is a great sign of predestination. "Electorium," says St. Gregory, "hic est conteri, quibus servatur de æternitate gaudere"—Lib. 16, Mare. 17. To be afflicted here below belongs to the elect, for whom is reserved the beatitude of eternity. Hence, we find in the lives of the saints that all, without exception, have been loaded with crosses. This is precisely what St. Jerome wrote to the virgin Eustochium: "Quære," says the holy doctor, "et invenies singulos sanctos adversa perpessos. Solus Solomon in delicii fuit, et ideo forsitan corruit"—Ep. 22. Seek, and you will find that every saint has been subject to tribulation: Solomon alone lived in the midst of delights, and therefore perhaps he was lost. The Apostle has said that all the predestined must be found like to Jesus Christ: "Whom he foreknew he also predestined to be made conformable to the image of his Son" —Rom. viii. 22. But the life of Jesus Christ was a life of continual suffering; hence the same Apostle says: "Yet so if we suffer with him that we may be also glorified with him"—Rom. viii. 17. If we shall suffer with Jesus Christ we shall then be glorified with Jesus Christ.

9. But we shall not be glorified with him unless we suffer with patience like our Saviour, who "when he was reviled did not revile; when he suffered he threatened not" —1 Pet. ii. 23. St. Gregory says that as to suffer with patience is a mark of predestination, so to suffer with impatience is presage of damnation. Hence, the Lord tells us that we shall attain salvation only by suffering with patience: "In your patience you shall possess your souls" —Luke xxi. 19. And let us be persuaded that God sends us tribulations only because he seeks our welfare; by them he wishes to detach us from earthly pleasures, which may occasion the loss of our eternal salvation. "The world," says St. Augustine, "is bitter and it is loved; if it were sweet how ardently, think you, would it be loved"—Serm. de temp. The world is bitter because all its delights do not content the heart of man, and because they all ultimately terminate in bitterness and remorse of conscience, but still it is loved. Imagine, then says the saint, were it sweet how intensely should we love it, and how completely would we forget the soul, heaven, and God. To wean an infant, and to give it a horror of taking suck, the mother puts gall on the paps. It is thus God treats us. He makes the very pleasures of this earth become bitter, that detaching our hearts from them we may pant after the eternal delights which he prepares in heaven for all who love him. It was for this end that our loving Saviour came on earth to suffer, that we might not refuse to imitate his example. "Christ," says St. Peter, "suffered for us, leaving you an example, that you should follow his steps"—1 Pet. ii. 21. Behold, how he invites us to follow him: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me"—Matt. xvi. 24. As if he said, he who wishes not to suffer, and refuses the cross, let him cease to pretend to be my disciple, or to expect to follow me to paradise.

10. But the desire of pleasing God is the sublime end which a soul should have in embracing sufferings. Ecclesiasticus says that some show friendship only in the time of prosperity, and abandon a friend in his adversity: "There is a friend for his own occasion, and he will not abide in the day of thy trouble"—Eccl. vi. 8. But the most certain testimony of love is to suffer with cheerfulness for the person loved. The sacrifice most agreeable to God consists in embracing with patience all the crosses which he sends. "Charity is patient..... beareth all things"—1 Cor. xiii. 4. Love bears all things: external crosses, loss of health, loss of property, of honours, of relatives, of friends: interior crosses, anguish, temptations, sorrows, desolation of spirit. By patience virtue is proved. Hence, in the lives of the saints we usually find a description of their patience under afflictions. It is thus the Lord proves our fidelity. The devil tempts us, and God also tempts us. The devil tempts us in order to bring us to perdition. God tempts us in order to prove us: "As gold in the furnace he hath proved them"—Wisd. iii. 6. As gold is proved by fire, so God proves the love of his lovers by the fire of tribulation. Hence, to be in tribulation is a mark that the soul is dear to God. "Because thou wast acceptable to God," said the angel to Tobias, "it was necessary that temptation should prove thee"—Tob. xii. 13. St. Jerome says that when God sends a person an occasion of suffering, he confers a greater favour than if he gave him power to raise the dead to life. "Quando Deus dat alicui ut mortuos resuscitet, minus dat, quam cum dat occasionem patiendi." Because, adds the saint, when we work miracles we are debtors to God, but when we bear afflictions with patience, God is in a certain manner our debtor. "Pro miraculis enim debitor sum Deo, et pro patientia debitorem habeo Christum."

11. O God, how is it possible for him who looks at the crucifix, and beholds a God dying in a sea of sorrows and insults—how, I say, is it possible for him, if he loves that God, not to bear with cheerfulness, or even not to desire to suffer every pain for his sake? St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say: "The sharpest pains become sweet when we behold Jesus on the cross." Justus Lipsius once found himself greatly afflicted with pains: a certain person endeavoured to encourage him to bear them with patience, by placing before him the patience of the stoics; but he turned to the crucifix and said: "There is true patience." He meant to say that the example of a God who had suffered so much for the love of us, is sufficient to animate us to endure all pain for the love of him. "The ignominy of the cross," says St. Bernard, "is grateful to him who is not ungrateful to a crucified God"—Serm. 25, in Cant. To him who loves his crucified Saviour pains and opprobrium are agreeable. When St. Eleazar was asked by his virgin spouse, St. Afra, how he could submit to so many insults from the rabble without seeking revenge, he said: "My spouse, think not that I am insensible to these insults; I feel them strongly; but I turn to Jesus on the cross, and continue to look at him until my soul becomes tranquil." Love, says St. Augustine, makes all things easy. "Omnia facilia charitati"—De natur. 60. After being wounded with divine love, St. Catherine of Genoa used to say that she knew not what it was to suffer. Although she endured the most grievous pains she felt none of them, because she regarded them as sent by him who loved her so tenderly. Thus also a religious of the Society of Jesus, when God visited him with any pain, sickness, or persecution, used to say within himself: "Tell me, O pain, sickness, or persecution, who sends you? Does God send you? Welcome, welcome!" Thus he was always in peace

12. Let us conclude. Since in this life we must suffer either cheerfully or with reluctance, let us endeavour to suffer with merit, that is with patience. Patience is a shield which defends us against all the pains arising from persecutions, infirmities, losses, and other afflictions. He who has not this shield has to bear all these pains. Let us, then, in the first place, ask this patience of God: without asking we shall never obtain this great gift. When afflictions come upon us, let us be careful to do violence to ourselves, and not to break out into words of impatience or complaint. The fire which burns in a vessel is soon extinguished when the vessel is closed. "To him that overcometh I will give the hidden manna"—Apoc. ii. 17. When a person does violence to conquer himself in adversity, by instantly embracing the cross which God sends him, oh! what sweetness does the Lord make him afterwards experience in the very tribulation which he suffers—a sweetness hidden from men of the world, but well known to souls that love God. St. Augustine used to say that to enjoy a good conscience in the midst of afflictions is sweeter than to live with a guilty conscience in the midst of delights. "Jucundius gaudere de bona conscientia inter molestias, quam de mala conscientia inter delicas"—De Catech. Rud. cap. 6. Speaking of herself, St. Teresa said: "I have several times experienced that when I generously resolve to do an act, God instantly makes the performance of it pleasant to me. He wishes the soul to feel these terrors in the beginning that she may have greater merit."

13. He who resolves to suffer for God suffers no more pain. Let us read the lives of the saints, and see how they have been enamoured of suffering. St. Gertrude used to say, that so great was her enjoyment in suffering, that no time was more painful than that in which she was free from pain. St. Teresa used to say, that she did not wish to live without suffering; hence, she would often exclaim: "Either to suffer or to die." St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi went so far as to say: "To suffer and not to die." When the tyrant was preparing new torments for the martyr Procopius, the saint said to him: "Torment me as much as you please; do you not know that to him who loves Jesus Christ there is nothing more dear than to suffer for Jesus Christ"—Ap. Sur. 8 Jul. St. Gordian, as St. Basil relates, being threatened with great torments if he refused to deny Jesus Christ, answered: "I am sorry that I can die but once for my Saviour Jesus Christ." He afterwards intrepidly suffered death. To the tyrant who threatened to make her die in a caldron of boiling pitch, St. Potamiena, virgin, said: "I entreat you to let me down into this caldron not at once, but by degrees, that thus I may suffer more for my Jesus." The tyrant complied with her request; she was let down gradually into the caldron, till the pitch having reached her neck took away her speech and her life—(Pallad. cap. 1.) Baronius describes (an. 122) the celebrated martyrdom of three holy virgins, called Faith, Hope, and Charity, who when threatened with torments by the tyrant Antiochus, courageously said: Do you not know that to Christians nothing is more desirable than to suffer for Jesus Christ? St. Faith was first scourged; her breasts were then cut off, she was afterwards tormented with fire, and finally beheaded. St. Hope was first beaten with the sinews of an ox; her ribs were then torn with iron combs, and she was afterwards thrown into a vessel of burning pitch. St. Charity was the youngest; she was no more than nine years old; hence the tyrant expected she would yield through fear of torments. He said to her, My child, be you at least wise, unless you wish to be tortured like your sisters. The holy child answered: You deceive yourself, O Antiochus; all your torments shall not make me forsake Jesus Christ. The tyrant ordered her to be fastened to a rope, and to be cast several times from a height to the ground until all her bones were dislocated. He then commanded her members to be pierced with sharp irons, so that she died exhausted of blood.

14. Let us come to other more modern examples. In Japan, a certain married woman called Maxentia was subjected to torments for the faith. One of the executioners wished to alleviate her pains, but she rejected the offer. Seeing her continue firm in confessing the faith, one of her persecutors pointed a sword twice to her cheek, in order to terrify her; but she said to him: "O God, how do you expect to terrify me with that death which I desire? The way to fill me with terror is to promise me life." After these words she stretched her neck to the executioner, and he cut off her head. In Japan, also, Father John Baptist Maciado, of the Society of Jesus, was confined in a damp prison, in which he remained for forty days in such intense pain that he could not rest by night or by day. From this prison he wrote to another religious: "My father, notwithstanding all my pains, I would not exchange my condition for that of the first monarch of the earth." From a prison in which he had a great deal to suffer, Father Charles Spinola wrote to his companions: "Oh! how sweet is it to suffer for Jesus Christ! I have received the news of my condemnation: I pray you to thank the divine goodness for the great gift bestowed upon me." In the same letter he added: "Charles Spinola condemned for Jesus Christ." Soon after he was burnt alive on a slow fire. It is said that, in thanksgiving to God, when he was fastened to the stake, he entoned the Psalm, "Laudate Dominum omnes gentes." Thus he died.

15. But how, some one may ask with wonder, were the holy martyrs able to suffer with so much joy? Were they not flesh? or did the Lord make them insensible to pain? No, says St. Bernard: "Non hoc facit stupor, sed amor; non deest dolor, sed superatur, sed contemnitur"—Serm. 61 in Cant. Their patience and jubilation under suffering, says the Saint, were the effect not of insensibility, but of the love which they bore to Jesus Christ; they were not exempt from pain, but through love for their Lord they conquered and despised it. That great servant of God, Father Hippolitus Durazzo, of the Society of Jesus, used to say: "Let God cost what he will, the price is never too great." And St. Joseph Calasanctius said that he who knows not how to suffer for Jesus Christ knows not how to gain Jesus Christ. Ah! souls that understand the language of love, being convinced that by embracing crosses they please God, know well how to find all their happiness in suffering.

PRAYER.

My crucified Jesus, thou hast suffered so many sorrows and insults for my sake; thou hast died in order to gain my love, and I have so often renounced thy love for nothing. Have mercy on me and pardon me. Blessed be thy mercy which has borne with me so long and with so much patience. During that time I neither loved thee nor cared to be loved by thee. I now love thee with my whole soul; and the greatest of all my pains is that which arises from having offended thee who hast loved me so tenderly. Yes, this is my greatest pain. But it is a pain which consoles me, because it gives me confidence that thou hast already pardoned me. Oh! that I had died rather than have ever offended thee. My God, if I have not hitherto loved thee I now give myself entirely to thee. I wish to renounce all things to love thee alone, my Saviour, who art worthy of infinite love. I have sinned enough against thee. The remainder of my life I wish to spend in loving thy heart, which is so enamoured of me. Tell me all thou wishest from me: I wish to do it. Give me strength to execute this wish. I love thee, O Infinite Goodness, I love thee with my whole heart; and for thy sake I accept all the pains which thou shalt be pleased to send me. Mary, my mother, assist me by thy intercession: in thee I trust. Amen.

SECTION I.

On patience in infirmity, poverty, contempt, and desolation.

1. We must practice patience in infirmities. These are the touch stone by which the spirit of a Christian is found to be of gold or of copper. Some are cheerful, patient, and devout, as long as they enjoy health; but when visited by sickness they commit a thousand defects; they appear to be inconsolable; they are impatient to all, even to the person who attends them through charity; they complain of every pain or inconvenience which they suffer; they complain of all, of the physician, the superior, the infirmarian, saying, that they are treated with neglect and inattention. Behold the gold is found to be copper. But, my father, such a person may say, I suffer so much, and can I not even complain, or tell what I endure? I do not forbid you to make known your pains when they are severe, but when they are trifling it is a weakness to complain of them at all, and to seek sympathy and compassion from every one who visits you. And should the remedies prescribed not remove your pains, I wish that you yield not to impatience under them, but that you resign yourself in peace to the will of God. Another may say: but where has charity gone? Behold how my sisters forget me, and abandon me on the bed of sickness. I pity you, not on account of your bodily infirmities, but on account of your want of patience under them, which makes you doubly sick—in body and soul. The sisters forget you; but you have forgotten Jesus Christ, who died abandoned for your sake on the cross. And what profit do you derive from complaining of the sisters? Complain of yourself because you have but little love for Jesus Christ, and, therefore, have so little patience. St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say: "If the sick had patience, there would be no more complaints." Salvian writes, "that there are many persons who, had they good health, could not be saints:" "Si fortes fuissent, sancti esse non possent"—Lib. 1, de Gubern. Dei. With regard to saintly females, we know from their published lives that they were almost all continually afflicted with various infirmities. For forty years St. Teresa was not free from pains for a single day. Hence, Salvian adds, "that persons dedicated to the love of Jesus Christ are infirm, and wish to continue in their infirmities:" "Christi dediti infirmi sunt, et volunt esse."

2. Another will perhaps say: I do not refuse sickness but I regret that on account of my infirmities I am not able to assist in choir, to go to communion, or to make mental prayer, and that I am a burden to the community. Allow me to answer all these excuses one by one. Tell me, why do you wish to go to the choir in order to recite the Office? or to the church in order to communicate? Is it not to please God? Well, but if it is God's will and pleasure that you neither go to choir to say the Office, nor to the church to communicate, but that you remain in bed to suffer, why should you be troubled? Father M. Avila (epist. 2) wrote to a priest labouring under sickness. "Friend, do not stop to examine what you would do if you had health, but be content to remain sick as long as it shall please God. If you seek the will of God it matters not whether you are in sickness or in health." St. Francis de Sales has even said, that "we serve God better by sufferings than by works." You say that in sickness you cannot make mental prayer, and why can you not make mental prayer? I grant that you cannot apply the mind to reflection, but why cannot you look at the crucifix, and offer to your crucified Saviour the pains which you suffer? And what prayer can be better than to suffer, and to resign yourself to the divine will, uniting your sufferings with those of Jesus Christ, and presenting them to God in union with the sufferings of his Son? You say that in sickness you are useless, and a burden to the community. But as you conform yourself to the divine will, so you ought to suppose that your sisters also conform to it, when they see that you are a burden to the monastery, not through your own fault, but by the will of God. Ah! such desires and complaints spring not from the love of God, but from self-love; for we would wish to serve the Lord not in the manner which pleases him, but in the way that is agreeable to ourselves.

3. Ah! embrace with peace all the infirmities which God sends you, if you truly wish to please him, and wish, at the same time, to give good example to your sisters. Oh! how great the edification given by the religious who, in spite of all her pains, and even in the danger of death with which she is threatened, preserves a serene countenance, abstains from all complaints against the physician or the sisters, thanks all for their attendance, whether it be much or little, and accepts in the spirit of obedience the remedies applied, however bitter or painful they may be!

St. Liduvina, as Surius relates, lay for thirty-eight years on a board, abandoned, covered with sores, and tortured by pains; she never complained of anything, but peaceably embraced all her sufferings. Blessed Humiliana of Florence a Franciscan nun, being afflicted with several painful and violent diseases, used to raise her hand to heaven, and say: "Be blessed, my love; be blessed." St. Clare was likewise continually sick for twenty-eight years, and the smallest complaint never escaped her lips. St. Theodore, abbot, had a painful ulcer during his whole life, and he would say, that "the Lord sent it in order to give him occasion to thank God unceasingly, as he was always accustomed to do"—(Sur. 22 April.) When we suffer any pain let us give a glance at so many holy martyrs, whose flesh was torn in pieces with iron hooks, or burnt with red-hot plates, and let us at the sight of their torments take courage to offer to God the pain by which we are afflicted. Patience under the severity of the seasons accompanies patience in infirmities. When cold or heat is intense, some are disturbed and complain, particularly if they have not the clothes or other comforts which they wish for. Be careful not to imitate their example; but bless these creatures as ministers of the divine will, and say with Daniel: "O ye fire and heat, bless the Lord ..... O ye cold and heat, bless the Lord"—Dan. iii. 66, 67.

4. Above all, we should, in the time of sickness, accept death (should it come,) and the death which God wills. And what is this life but a continual tempest in which we are always in danger of being lost? St. Lewis Gonzaga, though he died in the flower of youth, embraced death with joy, saying: "Now I find myself, (as I hope) in the grace of God; I know not what may happen to me hereafter. I therefore gladly quit this earth if it now pleases God to call me to the other life." But you will say: St. Aloysius was a saint, and I am a sinner. But listen to the answer of Father M. Avila: "Every one who finds himself even moderately well-disposed should desire death, in order to escape the danger of losing the grace of God, to which he is always exposed as long as he lives on this earth." What more desirable than, by a good death, to be secure of being no longer able to lose God! But (you reply) hitherto I have gained nothing for my soul, I would wish to live in order to do something before I die. But if God calls you at present to the other life, how do you know that for the future you will not be worse than you were hitherto? and that you will not fall into other sins and be lost? And if we had no other motive, we ought to embrace death with peace when it comes, because it delivers us from the commission of new sins. In this life no one is exempt from all sins, at least from all venial sins. Hence, St. Bernard says: "Why do we desire life, in which the longer we live the more we sin?"—Med. cap. 8. Why do we desire to live, since we know that the greater the number of our days, the more our sins shall be multiplied? Moreover, if we love God, we should sigh to see and to love him face to face in heaven. But unless death opens the gate to us we cannot enter into that happy country. Hence, the enamoured St. Augustine exclaimed: "Eja moriar, Domine, ut te videam:" Lord, take me out of life that I may be able to go to see thee.

5. In the second place, it is necessary to practice patience in the inconveniences of poverty, when we are in want of temporal goods. "What," says St. Augustine, "can be sufficient for him for whom God is not sufficient?" "Quod tibi sufficit cui Deus non sufficit?" They who possess God, though they should want everything else, possess all things. Hence, they can say: "Deus meus et omnia," my God and my all. Hence, the Apostle says, that though the saints have nothing they possess all things: "As having nothing, and possessing all things"—2 Cor. vi. 10. When, then, you want medicines in sickness, when you want food or fire in the winter, or clothes, say: "My God, thou alone art sufficient for me," and thus console yourself.

6. Embrace also the losses of creatures, such as the loss of property, of relatives, of friends. Such a nun loses a trifle, a book, a wax taper, a medal, and she disturbs the whole monastery, and cannot keep herself in peace. Another is inconsolable at the death of a relative. She gives up mental prayer, she abstains from communion, she is impatient to all her sisters, she shuts herself up in her cell, she will not take food, and sends away those who come to console her. To such a religious I would say, is this the love which you bear to God? Then it is not true that God is your every good, since it is now manifest that because you have lost a creature you no longer enjoy peace, and appear almost to care no more about God? Tell me what advantage do you derive from thus abandoning yourself to melancholy. Do you imagine that you please the person who has died? But no; you displease God, and also the deceased relative. How much more pleasing would it be to her if, conforming yourself to the divine will, you endeavour to abstain from weeping and howling, and sought to unite yourself more closely to God, and to pray for her if she is in purgatory. To shed an occasional tear at the death of a relative is a pardonable weakness of nature; but immoderate grief proceeds from weakness of spirit and of the love of God. Holy religious also hear of the death of persons most dear to them, but reflecting that God has willed their death, they instantly resign themselves, and go in peace to pray for them. They then make more frequent meditations and communions, and unite themselves more with God, hoping to go one day to enjoy him in heaven along with their deceased relatives.

7. Other nuns, who appear to be the most devout, are not so much afflicted at the loss of relatives and friends as at the loss of their director. They seem as if inclined to complain of God, saying that he has abandoned them by taking away their help and spiritual guide. Oh, what folly! It is God, and not a confessor, that must make us saints. The Lord certainly wishes that we do not leave our confessor as long as we have him to point out to us the will of God in our regard. But when God takes him away he will take care to send another, or to supply in some other way. Hence, to be disturbed when we are deprived of our ordinary director is not virtue, but an imperfection and a great imperfection; for the inquietude arises either from earthly attachment, or at least from want of confidence in God. Let it be your care, O blessed sister, to remain always detached from your director, and to be prepared to lose him whenever God wishes. And should he leave you, or should God call him to the other life, say with Job: "The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." You can then follow the directions which he has given you, though you should get another confessor: however, regulate your conduct, generally, by the advice of your ordinary confessor, who (commonly speaking) may be said to be the most secure guide; because he is assigned to you by God, and the extraordinary director is chosen by yourself.

8. Thirdly, it is necessary to practice patience in contempt and persecutions. But you say, I have not failed in anything, why should I receive such an affront? Why should I be persecuted? This is not the will of God. But do you not know the answer which Jesus Christ gave to St. Peter, martyr, who complained of being unjustly imprisoned, saying: "O Lord, what evil have I done that I should suffer this mortification?" Jesus answered from the cross: "And what evil have I done that I should be nailed to this cross?" If, then, my dear sister, your Redeemer has voluntarily embraced death for the love of you, it is not too much for you to embrace this mortification for the love of him. It is true that God does not will the sin of the person who insults or persecutes you; but he certainly wishes that you bear this contradiction for his sake, and also for your own welfare. "Although," says St. Augustine, "we have not committed the fault which is imputed to us, we have been guilty of other sins which deserve the chastisement we receive, and even far greater chastisement. "Esto non habemus peccatum quod objicitur, habemus tamen quod digne in nobis flagalletur"—Ps. lxviii.

9. All the saints have been persecuted in this world. St. Basil was accused of heresy before St. Damasus, pope. St. Cyril, of Jerusalem, was condemned as a heretic by forty bishops, and was deprived of his see. St. Athanasius was charged with the crime of sorcery, and St. John Chrysostom with sins against chastity. St. Romuald, at the age of more than a hundred years, was accused of an enormous sin, for which some said he deserved to be burned alive. St. Francis de Sales was charged with an unchaste familiarity with a secular lady, and remained for three years under the imputation till his innocence was discovered. Of St. Liduvina it is related, that one day a woman entered her chamber, and began to insult her in the most atrocious manner; and because the saint preserved her usual tranquility the tiger, becoming more furious, began to spit in her face, and seeing the saint still undisturbed she screamed like a mad woman. There is no remedy: "for," says the Apostle, "all who will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution"—2 Tim. iii. 12. All who wish to follow Jesus Christ shall be persecuted. If, says St. Augustine, you are unwilling to suffer any persecution, tremble lest you have not as yet begun to serve Jesus Christ. Who more innocent and holy than our Savious? And still he was persecuted by men until he died on a cross, covered with wounds, and overwhelmed with shame. Hence, to animate us to bear persecutions with peace, the Apostle exhorts us to keep always before our mind Jesus Christ crucified. "Think diligently upon him that endured much opposition from sinners against himself"—Heb. xii. 3. Let us rest secure that when we suffer persecution in peace, God will take up our defence; and should he even permit us to remain in dishonour here, he will reward our patience with greater honours hereafter.

10. In the fourth and last place, we ought to practice patience in desolation of spirit, which are the most sensible and the sharpest pains which a soul that loves God can experience on this earth. To a soul assisted by divine consolations all insults, sorrows, losses, and persecutions are not only an affliction but rather a source of consolation, because they give her occasion to offer these pains to her Lord, and by such offerings to unite herself more closely with her beloved. The severest pain of a loving soul consists in seeing herself without devotion, without fervour, without desires, and in finding nothing but disgust and tediousness in meditation and communion. But, according to St. Teresa, God has the best proof of their love, when without relish, and even with anguish and pain, they persevere patiently in their accustomed exercises. By aridity and temptations, says the saint, God tries his lovers. Blessed Angela of Foligno, finding herself in a state of aridity, complained to God as if he had abandoned her. No, daughter, answered our Lord, I now love you more than before, and I bring you nearer to myself. In the beginning some religious, finding themselves in desolation, imagine that God has abandoned them, or that they are not fit for the way of perfection; thus they leave the road in which they began to walk, begin to give liberty to the senses, and thus lose all they have done. Be attentive, do not allow yourself to be deceived by the enemy; when you feel aridity be constant and omit none of your ordinary exercises of devotion. Humble yourself, and say that you deserve to be treated in this manner in punishment of your sins. Above all, resign yourself to the divine will, and trust more than ever in God; for that is the time of rendering yourself dear to your divine spouse. Do you imagine that the saints were always in the enjoyment of consolations and celestial tenderness? Know that they have spent the greater part of their life in desolations and darkness. And to speak the truth, which I have learned by experience, I have but little confidence in the soul that abounds in spiritual sweetness, without having first passed through the ordeal of internal sufferings, because it not unfrequently happens that such souls go on well as long as the divine consolations continue, but when tried by aridity they give up all, and abandon themselves to a life of tepidity.

11. But such a nun may say: I do not refuse this cross, if it be the will of God; but what afflicts me is that this abandonment may be the chastisement of my infidelities. But I answer: let it be a chastisement, as you say; to you, in a special manner, I say, that if you have failed by attachment to any creature, God, who is jealous of the heart of his spouses, justly withdraws himself. Let it then be a chastisement, is it not a just one? Is it not the will of God that you accept it? Accept it then in peace, and remove the cause of your desolation, take away affections to creatures, take away dissipation of spirit, arising from excessive indulgence of the eyes, the tongue, and the ears; give yourself again entirely to God, and he will restore your former fervour. But seek not to be consoled by your former tenderness, but rather ask strength to be faithful to God. Be persuaded that he sends desolations only for our greater profit, and to prove our love. He said to St. Gertrude, that "he tenderly loves the souls that serve him at their own expense," that is, in aridity and without sensible sweetness.

12. Love is not proved so much in following one who caresses you, as in seeking after him who flies from you. "But," says St. Bernard, "fear not, O spouse of Jesus." "Ne timeas, O sponsa, si paulisper subtrahit (Jesus) faciem suam; omnia cooperantur in bonum; recedit in cautelam, ne incipias contemnere Sodales ..... ut desideratus avidius quæritur"—In scala Claust. "Fear not," he says, "if the spouse hides his face for a little;" know that he does all for your good; he withdraws for your security, lest finding yourself greatly caressed you begin to despise your companions by esteeming yourself better than they are; he withdraws also that you may desire him with greater ardour, and seek after him with greater solicitude. You must, in the meantime, persevere in your pious exercises, though you should suffer in them the agonies of death: far more painful was the agony which your spouse suffered in the garden of Gethsemani, when he was preparing for death, and praying for you. "Being in an agony he prayed the longer"—Luke xxii. 43. Be constant, then, in seeking after your spouse, he will not delay long to come and console you. "Expecta illum, quia veniens veniet et non tardabit"—Hab. And should he not come to give you consolation and tenderness, be content with receiving from him courage and strength to love him without the recompense of present delights. God is more pleased with a strong than with a tender love.

13. But in general, St. Thomas says, that to reflect on them before they happen is a great help to bear all tribulations with fortitude. Jesus Christ said to his disciples: "In the world you shall have distress: but have confidence, I have overcome the world"—John xvi. 23. My children, know that in the world you shall be afflicted and despised; but have confidence in me who have conquered the world. The reason is that by reflecting beforehand on tribulation, and embracing it with patience, we form to ourselves an idea of it, not as an evil, but as a good, conducive to eternal life. Thus, the premeditation takes from us the fear of evil, which the tribulation excites. This has been the practice of the saints: they have embraced crosses long before they happened; and thus they have found themselves prepared to bear them in peace, when they have come suddenly upon them. Accustom yourself, then, in mental prayer, to embrace the tribulations which are likely to come upon you. And when you imagine it to be impossible for you to suffer such a tribulation (should it happen,) pray to the Lord to give you his aid to submit to it in case it occurs, and have confidence in him, saying: "I can do all things in him who strengtheneth me"—Phil. iv. 13. And when you do this, doubt not but your prayers will in that case obtain the strength which you do not possess. And how have the holy martyrs obtained courage to bear so many torments, and deaths the most painful, except by prayer and by recommending themselves to God? When you find yourself under the cross, have recourse instantly to prayer. "Is," says St. James, "any of you sad, let him pray"—v. 13. Is any one of you afflicted with any tribulation or passion, let him pray, and not cease to pray until he finds the peace of his soul restored. "Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou wilt glorify me"—Ps. xlix. 15. When you are in tribulation invoke my aid, and I will rescue you from difficulties, and you will give glory to me. When a soul in trouble recommends herself to God, he delivers her from the evil which afflicts her, or gives her grace to bear it patiently, and thus she glorifies the Lord. St. Ignatius of Loyola used to say, "the greatest evil which could befall him would be the destruction of the society; but he hoped that even should such a calamity happen, his peace of mind would be restored by a quarter of an hour's mental prayer." Endeavour, also, in the time of tribulation, to communicate more frequently. The ancient Christians, in the time of persecution, prepared themselves for martyrdom by frequent communion. Be careful to ask advice from your director or some other spiritual person: for a word of comfort gives great help to bear the cross with patience. But beware of explaining your trials to imperfect souls, for they will only add to your troubles and confusion, particularly if you have received an injury, or if you actually suffer persecution. But above all, I say again, have recourse to prayer, have recourse to Jesus in the most holy sacrament, and beg of him to make you in all things conformed to his holy will. He promises to comfort all who are in tribulation, when they have recourse to him. "Come to me, all you that labour and are burdened, and I will refresh you"—Matt. xi. 28.

PRAYER.

My God, I offer to thee the pains of Jesus, thy Son, in satisfaction for my sins. He is the Lamb whom thou didst one day behold sacrificed for thy glory, and for our salvation, on the altar of the cross. For the love of that victim so dear to thee, pardon me all the offences, whether grievous or venial, which I have offered to thee. I am sorry for them with my whole heart, because by them I have offended thy infinite goodness. Thou, my God, dost call me to thy love: behold, I leave all things, and I come to thee, my treasure and my life. For the love of thee, I renounce all the goods, and honours, and pleasures of the world. I love thee, O my Sovereign Good, above every other good. Ah! my Jesus, do not permit me to resist any longer, and to be ungrateful to the tender affection which thou hast shown me. Ah! make known to me always, more and more, the greatness of thy goodness, that I may be enamoured of thee, who art infinitely amiable. Thou hast shown thyself enamoured of my soul, and shall I be able to love anything but thee? No, my Redeemer, for thee alone do I wish to live, thee alone do I wish to love. O Mary, mother, assist me, and obtain for me grace to be faithful in this my promise. Amen.

SECTION III.

On patience in temptations.

1. Blessed sister of the Lord, your past life does not content either God or yourself; if death came upon you at present you would certainly die discontented. But since (as I hope) you have resolved to serve him better for the future, prepare yourself to combat temptations. Behold the admonition of the Holy Ghost: "Son, when thou comest to the service of God, stand in justice and fear, and prepare thy soul for temptation"—Eccl. ii. 1. And remember that, as the prophet says, religious are the most acceptable food to the devil. "Cibus ejus electus"—Hab. i. 16. The enemy labours more to gain one religious than a hundred seculars. And why? First, because by making a spouse of Jesus Christ become one of his slaves, he gains a greater triumph. Secondly, because by bringing a nun into sin, he gains more than one, because by her bad example she will probably draw others with her. On the other hand, the Lord usually permits souls that are most dear to him, to be most severely tormented by temptations. While he lived in the solitude of Palestine, in prayer and penitential works, St. Jerome was greatly afflicted with temptations: behold, how he himself described them—"I was alone, and my heart was full of bitterness: my dried and withered members were covered with a sack. My skin became as black as that of a Moor: the hard ground was my bed, which served rather to give pain than rest: my food was very scanty; and still my heart was inflamed against my will with bad desires. I had no other refuge than to have recourse to Jesus, and to implore his aid."

2. The Lord permits us to be tempted for our greater good. First, that we may be more humble. Ecclesiasticus says: "What doth he know that hath not been tried?"—xxxiv. 9. What does he who has not been tempted know? In truth no one is better acquainted with his own weakness than the man who is tempted. St. Augustine remarks, that St. Peter, before he had been tempted, presumed on his own strength, boasting that he would have constancy to embrace death rather than to deny Jesus Christ; but when tempted he miserably denied his Master, and then he became sensible of his weakness. "Petrus qui ante tentationem præsumit de se, in tentatione didicit se"—St. Aug. in Ps. xxxiv. Hence, having favoured St. Paul with celestial revelations, our Lord, in order to preserve him from vain-glory wished him to be molested with an importunate temptation against chastity, which is of all temptations the most humiliating to man. "And," says the Saint, "lest the greatness of the revelations should exalt me, there was given me a sting of my flesh, an angel of Satan to buffet me"—2 Cor. xii. 7.

3. Secondly, the Lord permits us to be tempted in order to make us rich in merits. Many religious are disturbed by scruples on account of the bad thoughts which molest them. But they are disturbed in vain; for it is certain that evil consents, but not evil thoughts, are sins. Temptations, however violent they may be, leave no stain on the soul when they happen without any fault of ours, and when we drive them away. St. Catherine of Sienna and Blessed Angela of Foligno were strongly tempted against chastity, but the temptations increased rather than diminished their purity. Every time the soul conquers a temptation she gains a degree of grace for which she shall be afterwards rewarded with a degree of glory in heaven. Hence, we shall receive as many crowns as we resist temptations. "As often," says St. Bernard, "as we conquer we are crowned."

And our Lord said to St. Matilda: "He who is tempted places as many gems on my head as he overcomes temptations." In the Cistercian Chronicles it is related that a certain monk was one night greatly molested with unchaste temptations, which he overcame. A lay brother had a vision, in which he saw a most beautiful young man handing to him a crown of gems, saying: Go to such a monk, and bring him this crown, which he has gained this night. The lay brother related the vision to the abbot, who sent for the monk that had been tempted. When the abbot heard from him the resistance he had made against the temptations, he understood the reason why the Lord had prepared so great a reward for him in heaven. The divine mother revealed to St. Bridget that for the violence which the Saint had done to herself, in order to banish bad thoughts, our Lord would give her a reward, although the thought remained in her mind. "Tamen," said the virgin, "pro illo conatu coronam in cælis recipies"—Apud Blos. mon. spir. c. 3, s. 4.

4. "And God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able, but will make also with the temptation issue that you may be able to bear it" —1 Cor. x. 13. St. Jerome says that to a ship no tempest is more dangerous than too long a calm. He meant to say that the tempest of temptation prevents a man from rotting in sloth, and makes him unite himself more closely to God, by turning to him to ask his graces, by renewing good purposes, by making good acts of humility, of confidence, and of resignation. In the lives of the ancient fathers (sec. 7) we read, that to a certain young man who was constantly and severely assailed by carnal temptations, his spiritual father, seeing him in great affliction, said: "Son, do you wish to pray to God to deliver you from so many temptations, which do not allow you to live an hour in peace?" The young man answered: "No, my father, for though I am greatly molested by these temptations, I derive great advantage from them, for, with the divine aid, I thus make continual acts of virtue. I now pray more than I did before, I fast more frequently, I watch more, I endeavour to practice greater mortifications of my rebellious flesh. It is better for you to pray to God that he may assist me by his grace to bear these temptations with patience, and thus to advance in perfection." Such temptations, then, we should not desire, but we ought to accept them with resignation, believing that God permits them for our greater good. The Apostle, when molested by similar temptations, several times implored the Lord to deliver him from them. But God answered: "My grace is sufficient for thee." "For which thing thrice I besought the Lord that it might depart from me. And he said to me: My grace is sufficient for thee; for power is made perfect in infirmity"—2 Cor. xii. 8, 9. You will say: but St. Paul was a saint. And St. Augustine answers: by what means, think you, did the saints resist temptations? Was it by their own strength, or by the power of God? "An isti in seipsis possunt, an non in Domini?"—Conf. lib. 8, c. 11. The saints have trusted in God, and thus have conquered. Hence, the holy doctor adds: Do you also abandon yourself into the hands of God, and fear not. He who placed you in the combat will not leave you alone, neither will he abandon you to perdition. "Progice te in eum, noli metuere, non se substrachet ut cadas"—Loc. cit.

5. But let us come to what is practical, and see with what arms we must fight in order to escape defeat. The first the principal, and I may say the only and absolutely necessary, means for conquering temptations, is to have recourse to God by prayer. Speaking of the necessity of humility, in order to be true disciples of Jesus Christ, St. Augustine says: "If you ask what holds the first place in the discipline of Christ, I will answer—humility. What is the second?—Humility. What is the third?—Humility. And as often as you ask so often shall I give the same answer" —Ep. 56. Now, were you to ask what are the means of overcoming temptations, I would answer: the first means is prayer; the second is prayer; the third is prayer; and should you ask me a thousand times I would always repeat the same. This means is particularly necessary for conquering temptations against purity; these, as the wise man says, are overcome only by recommending ourselves to God. "And as I knew that I could not otherwise be continent except God gave it . . . I went to the Lord and besought him" —Wis. viii. 21. As soon as I knew that I could not obtain continence unless God gave it, I went to the Lord and asked it from him. Hence, St. Jerome has written: "Statim ut libido titillaverit sensum, erumpamus in vocem: Domine auxiliator meus"—Ep. 22, ad Eustoch. As soon as lust assails us, let us instantly say: "Lord, assist me; do not permit me to offend you." Thus the Abbot Isaias exhorted his disciples always to repeat in such temptations: "Incline unto my aid, O God!"—and he would add that this is a secure defence. He had just reason to say so; for God cannot violate his promises to hear all who pray to him: "Cry to me, and I will hear thee"—Jer. xxxiii. 3. "Call upon me . . . I will deliver thee"—Ps. xlix. 15. "Ask and it shall be given you; seek and you shall find"—

Matt. vii. 7. "For every one that asketh receiveth"—Luke xi. 10. "You shall ask whatsoever you will, and it shall be done unto you"—John xvi. 7.

6. In the book of the Sentences of the Fathers (sec. 4,) it is written, that St. Pachomius related to his disciples that he once heard the devils discoursing together; one of them said: "My monk, when I tempt him, listens to me; he does not turn to God, and, therefore, I make him fall frequently." Another complained that he could do nothing with his monk, because he instantly asked help from God, and thus was always victorious. Hence, brethren (concluded the holy abbot,) resist temptations by always invoking the name of Jesus. But this must be done immediately, without listening to or arguing with the temptation. Another monk (as we find in the Lives of the Fathers, sec. 12) complained to an aged father of being continually tempted to impurity; the good old man prayed for him, and learned by revelation that the monk did not turn away instantly from the temptation, but used to stop to look at it. The father corrected him for this fault, and the monk was not molested afterwards as much as before. "While the enemy is small," says St. Jerome, "kill him"—Epis. 22, ad Eust. A lion when small is easily killed, but not when he has become large. Unchaste temptations must be instantly shaken off, as we shake from the hand the sparks that fly from the fire. The best means of conquering them is, as I have said, to turn away from them without listening to them. Were a queen tempted by a negro slave, what would she do? Would she not indignantly turn away without giving him an answer? Be careful to act in this manner if the devil should molest you; turn away without answering him, and invoke the name of Jesus and Mary; and if you do this, you shall be always certain of not falling into sin. St. Francis de Sales says: "The instant you feel any temptation, imitate children, who, when they see a wolf, run into the arms of their father or mother, or at least cry out to them for assistance. Do you, in like manner, run with filial confidence to Jesus and Mary."

7. In temptations it is also very useful to make on yourself the sign of the cross. St. Augustine says: "All the machinations of the devil are reduced to nothing by the powers of the cross"—De Symb. cap. 1. By giving his life on the cross Jesus destroyed the powers of hell; and therefore, at the sign of that sacred symbol, all the machinations of the devil vanish. St. Athanasius relates of St. Anthony that when the devils assailed him he instantly armed himself with the sign of the cross, and, thus armed, would say to them: of what use is it to labour to injure me when I am rendered secure by this sign, and by the confidence I have in my Lord? St. Gregory Nazianzen relates, what is still more wonderful, that Julian the Apostate, knowing the virtue of the sign of the cross, used, when terrified by the devils, to make on himself that holy sign, and the devils would fly away. "Ad crucem confugit, eaque adversus terrores consignat"—St. Greg. Naz. orat. 1, in Jul.

8. The second means of conquering temptations is to humble yourself, and to distrust your own strength. To make us humble the Lord often permits us to be assaulted with temptations, and even frequently with temptations the most filthy. Hence, when we see ourselves thus molested let us humble ourselves and say: I deserve to be thus tormented for the offences I have hitherto offered to you. In the lives of the fathers, it is related that a virgin and anchoret, called Sara, was cruelly persecuted in her desert by the spirit of impurity. She never asked God to deliver her from the temptation, but humbled herself, and constantly implored strength. The more violently the devil tempted her, the more she laboured to humble herself, and to supplicate the divine aid. Finally, the enemy not being able to make her fall into sins of impurity, endeavoured to tempt her by vain-glory. Hence, he said with a loud voice: "Sara, you have conquered, you have conquered." The servant of God answered: "No, wicked spirit, I have not conquered you, but Jesus, my God, has conquered you"—Erib. Rosveid. Vit. P. P. lib. 3. Thus let us humble ourselves, and at the same time let us have recourse with confidence to God, who protects all who hope in him. "He is the protection of all who trust in him"—Ps. xvii. 31. He himself has promised to deliver all who hope in him. "Because he hoped in me, I will deliver him"—Ps. xc. 14. When, then, we find ourselves tortured by temptations and fears of losing God, let us say with great courage: "In thee, O Lord, have I hoped, let me never be confounded"—Ps. xxx. In thee, O Lord, I have placed my hopes, do not permit me ever to be confounded, or to incur thy enmity. I say with great courage; for, according to St. Teresa, when the devils see themselves despised they remain powerless. And when the enemy represents the great difficulty of doing what is necessary to become saints, let us say with diffidence to ourselves, but with confidence in God: "I can do all things in him who strengtheneth me"—Phil. iv. 13. I can do nothing of myself, but I can do all things with the aid of my Lord.

9. The third means of overcoming temptations is to make them known to your spiritual father. Thieves when discovered fly away. Hence, St. Philip Neri used to say, that a temptation disclosed is half conquered. St. Anthony relates (p. 3, tit. 24, sec. 7,) that brother Ruffinus, the companion of St. Francis, was assailed by a strong temptation to despair, and to believe that all he did was lost. The afflicted brother concealed the temptation from his superior, St. Francis; it became more violent, and one day the devil appeared to him in the form of Jesus crucified, and said to him—know that you and Francis, and all your followers, are damned. Hence, Ruffinus regarded himself as lost. This was revealed to St. Francis, who sent for him; but Ruffinus refused to come: at length he went to the Saint, and disclosed the temptation. The Saint ordered him to despise it. The devil returned, but seeing himself treated with contempt he fled away. And afterwards Jesus crucified appeared to him, and assured him that he was in the state of grace.

10. The fourth means (which is a very important one) of relieving oneself from temptations, is to avoid the occasions of them. St. Basil says, that God assists the man who is engaged in the contest against his own will; but he who voluntarily places himself in the battle, does not deserve compassion, and is, therefore, abandoned by God. And, before him, Ecclesiasticus said: "He that loveth danger, shall perish in it"—iii. 27. He who loves danger and goes in search of it, shall perish in it: nor is it of any use to hope for aid from God; to trust in God, and to expose oneself voluntarily to the occasion of sin, is not a holy but a rash confidence, which merits chastisement.

11. Lastly, it is necessary to give in this place two very important admonitions. First, it is necessary to remark, that we must conquer some temptation by contrary acts; for example, temptations to revenge must be overcome by seeking to do good to those who have offended you; temptations to vanity, by humbling ourselves; to envy by rejoicing at the good of others; similar temptations must be conquered in like manner. But it is better to resist other temptations, such as those against faith, or against chastity, or to blasphemy, by despising them, and by making good acts directly opposed to the temptations, such as acts of confidence, of contrition, of charity. St. John Climacus relates (Gradu. 33,) that a certain monk was greatly tormented with blasphemous temptations. The miserable man was all in confusion, he went to a good father and told him all the execrable blasphemies that passed through his mind.

Have confidence, said the father, I take on myself all these sins; do not think of them any more. The monk followed his advice, and his peace of mind was restored. But with regard to temptations against chastity, it is not advisable for timorous souls to contend directly with the bad thought, saying and repeating: I will not do it, I will not consent to it. For by endeavouring to make these contrary acts, the image of the bad objects presented to the mind becomes more vivid, and thus the struggle is longer and more severe. It is better to renew in general the purpose of dying a thousand times rather than offend God. It is also useful to renew your vows, particularly the vow of chastity; you must, then, instantly turn to God for help, making acts of hope and love, as has been already said, and frequently invoking the most holy names of Jesus and Mary.

12. Secondly it is necessary to remark, that the most dangerous temptations are those which come under the appearance of good, so that a soul, without perceiving it, may find that she has fallen into some precipice. This may easily happen to spiritual persons in particular. "A good man," says St. Bernard, "is never deceived, except by the similitude of good"—Serm. 60, in Cant. The devil deceives souls that have a good intention only by the appearance of good. St. Bonaventure relates (in Vita S. Fran. c. 10) that there was a brother so attached to silence, that he would not speak even in confession, but wished to explain his sins by signs. The minister-general, in presence of St. Francis, bestowed great praise on the brother for his exact observance of silence. But the saint said: "My father, you deceive yourself; command him to confess his sins twice a week." The minister imposed the precept, but the brother refused to obey, and became so obstinate on this point, that on account of his disobedience, he in the end abandoned the religious state. Still more dangerous should be the temptation which would induce a religious to entertain too great an affection for the spiritual father, or for any other person, because she considers him to be a saint. I conclude, by repeating that, to overcome temptations, all the means explained in this chapter are very good, but the first, and the one which is absolutely necessary, is to have recourse to God by prayer, that he may give us light and strength to conquer. Without asking the divine aid, it is impossible to overcome temptations, and if we ask it we shall certainly be victorious. "Praising, I will call upon the Lord, and I shall be saved from my enemies"—Ps. xvii. 4.

PRAYER.

Ah! my God, I will no longer resist the love which thou dost entertain for me. This love made thee bear me with so much patience when I offended thee. Ah! my Jesus, through thy merits do not permit me ever more to offend thee. O make me cease to be ungrateful to thee, or make me cease to live. I see that thou dost wish me to be saved, and I wish to be saved, that I may go to sing thy mercies for eternity in heaven. Lord, do not abandon me. I know that thou wilt never abandon me if I do not first abandon thee: but past experience makes me afraid of my weakness. Ah! through the painful death which thou didst one day suffer for me on the cross, give me strength in my temptations, and especially the grace to have immediate recourse to thee. I love thee, O infinite goodness, and I hope to love thee always. Ah! bind me with the sweet chains of thy love, that my soul may never more be separated from thee. O Mary, thou art called the mother of perseverance; this great gift is dispensed through thee; thee I ask to obtain it for me: through thy intercession I certainly hope for it. Amen.

CHAPTER XIV.

ON RESIGNATION TO THE WILL OF GOD.

SECTION I.

On the great advantages of resignation to the divine will.

1. St. John Chrysostom says that all the perfection of the love of God consists in resignation to the divine will. As hatred divides the wills of enemies, so love unites the wills of lovers, so that each wishes only what the other desires. "Idem velle," says St. Jerome to Demetriades, "et idem nolle firma amicitia est." Hence the wise man says: "They that are faithful in love shall rest in him"—Wis. iii. 9. Souls that are faithful in loving God acquiesce in all that he wills. Since nothing is more dear to us than self-will, the sacrifice of it is the most acceptable offering we can present to the Lord. This is the sacrifice which God himself continually asks of us with so much earnestness. "My son, give me thy heart"—Prov. xxiii. 26. Son, give me your heart, that is your will. Nothing else that we offer to God can content him as long as we reserve our own will. I explain myself by this example: If you had two servants, one of whom laboured continually, but always according to his own will, and the other performed less work, but was obedient to all your directions, you would certainly entertain a great regard for the latter, and little or no esteem for the former. Oh! how often do we deceive ourselves by desiring to engage in certain undertakings in order to please ourselves, without seeing that they are not conformable to the divine will. How often do we act through self-love, saying: But what I wish to do is conducive to the glory of God. But let us be persuaded that the greatest glory we can give to God is to conform ourselves to his divine will. Blessed Henry Suson used to say: "God is not so much glorified when we abound in lights and spiritual consolations as when we submit to the divine will and pleasure." Hence, Blessed Stephana of Soncino saw among the seraphim certain souls whom she had known on earth; and she learned by revelation that they had attained that sublime elevation by the perfect union of their will in this life with the will of God.

2. All the malice of sin consists in wishing what God does not will: for then, says St. Anselm, we, in a certain manner, endeavour to rob God of his crown. "Cum homo vult aliquid per propriam voluntatem, Deo aufert quasi suam coronam: sicut enim corona soli regi, competit, sic propria voluntas soli Dei"—Lib. de simil. c. 7. He who wishes to follow his own will against the will of God, takes, as it were, forcibly from God his crown; for as the crown belongs only to the sovereign, so to do his own will (without dependence on others) belongs to God alone. Samuel said to Saul that to refuse to conform to the divine will was a species of idolatry. "It is like the crime of idolatry to refuse to obey"—1 Kings xv. 23. It is called idolatry, because in refusing to conform to the divine will, man, instead of adoring the will of God, adores his own will. Now, since all the malice of a creature consists in contradicting the Creator, so all the goodness of the creature consists in a union with the will of the Creator. He who conforms himself to the divine will becomes, as the Lord said to David, a man according to God's own heart. "I have found David . . . . . a man according to my own heart, who shall do all my wills"—Acts xxiii. 22. The Lord also says: a soul that is conformed to my will shall have for her name my will. "Thou shalt be called my pleasure in it"—Isaia lxii. 4. Yes, for in this happy soul, because self-will is dead, the will of God only lives.

3. Ah! happy the soul that can always say with the sacred spouse: "My soul melted when he spoke"—Cant. v. 5. My soul melted as soon as my beloved spoke. Why does she say melted? Listen: what is rendered liquid no longer retains its own shape, but takes the form of the vessel in which it is contained. Thus loving souls do not retain their own wills, but conform them to whatever their beloved wills. This conformity implies a will docile and pliant in all things pleasing to God, compared with the obdurate will that resists the divine will. An instrument is said to be a good one when it is obedient to the person who employs it: if it refuse to obey of what use is it? For example, were a pencil to resist the hand of the painter; if when drawn to the right it should turn to the left; if when drawn downwards it should seek to move upwards, what would the painter do? Would he not instantly cast it into the fire? Some place their sanctity in works of penance, others in frequent communion, others in reciting many vocal prayers. But, no; St. Thomas says that perfection consists not in those things, but in submission to the divine will. "The perfection of the human soul consists in its subjection to God"—2. 2. q. 82, a. 8. Works of penance, prayers, communions, are good, inasmuch as God wills them; hence, they serve only as means to unite us to the divine will. But all perfection and sanctity consist in doing the will of God. In a word, the divine will is the rule of all goodness and virtue. Because it is holy, it sanctifies all, even the most indifferent actions, when they are done to please God. "The will of God is your sanctification," says the apostle.—1 Thess. iv. 3. The accomplishment of the divine will is the sanctification of your souls.

4. I know well that men cheerfully conform to the will of God in prosperity, but are afterwards unwilling to submit to it in adversity. But this is great folly, for they thus suffer doubly, and without merit from the evils which befall them; since (whether they wish or wish not) the will of God shall be accomplished. "My counsel shall stand, and all my will shall be done"—Isaia, xlv. 10. When then a person in sickness does not accept his pains with patience, but gives way to anger, and complains of every one, what does he do? Does he, by his impatience, get rid of his pains? No; on the contrary, he increases them, because, by resisting the will of God, he loses his peace, and still endures the same pains. "Who hath resisted him, and hath had peace"—Job ix. 4. But were he to embrace his sufferings in peace, he would feel his pains less sensibly, and would derive consolation from the thought of pleasing God by accepting crosses from his divine hands. Oh! what pleasure does he give to the Lord, who, in the time of tribulation, says with David: "I was dumb, and I opened not my mouth, because thou hast done it"—Ps. xxxviii. 10.

My God, I have shut my mouth, and have not dared to speak, because I know that thou hast done it. No, there is no one who is better able than God to promote our welfare, or who loves us more than our Creator. And let us be persuaded, that whatever he does is for our good, and because he loves us. Many things appear to us to be misfortunes, and we call them misfortunes, but if we understood the end for which God sends them, we should see that they are graces. It appeared a calamity to king Manasses to be deprived of his kingdom, and to be made a slave of the prince of the Assyrians: but these misfortunes were blessings; for after his downfall he returned to God, and did penance for the wickedness of his life. "And after that he was in distress, he prayed to the Lord his God, and did penance exceedingly before the God of his fathers"—2 Par. xxxiii. 12. We labour under a vertigo, and therefore many things appear to us to go to ruin; and we know not that it is our giddy head that makes them appear to us different from what they are in reality. Such a nun may say: How does it happen that every thing goes astray with me? No, sister, but you go astray; your will is crooked; for all that happens comes from God. He does all for your welfare, but you know it not.

5. And whom can we ever find more solicitous for our welfare and for our salvation than God? To make us understand this truth, he assimilates himself at one time to a shepherd, going through the desert in search of his lost sheep (Luke xv. 4); at another, to a mother who cannot forget her own child: "Can a woman forget her infant so as not to have pity on the son of her womb"—Isaia lxix. 15. Again, to a hen gathering and sheltering her chickens under her wings, that they may suffer no injury: "Jerusalem, Jerusalem . . . . . how often would I have gathered together thy children, as the hen doth gather her chickens under her wings, and thou wouldst not"—Matt. xxxiiii. 37. In a word, according to David, God surrounds us with his good will, in order to save us from all the assaults of our enemies. "Lord, thou hast crowned us with a shield of thy good will" —Ps. v. 13. Why, then, do we not abandon ourselves entirely into the hands of this good father? Would it not be folly in a blind man, placed in the midst of precipices, to reject the guidance of a father who loves him, and to follow the way suggested by his own caprice? Happy the soul that permits herself to be conducted in the way which God leads her. In his Spiritual Treasury, Father Sanguire relates, that a certain young man, desirous of entering the Society of Jesus, was rejected because he wanted an eye.

Who would not have said that the defect was a great misfortune to the poor young man? But that defect was the occasion of the happiest end which he could meet; for, on account of it, he was received into the society only on the condition that he would consent to go on the Indian mission. He went to India, and had the happiness of dying for the faith. The venerable Balthassar Alvares used to say that "the kingdom of heaven is the kingdom of the lame, the tempted, and the abject." Let us, then, as if blind, permit ourselves to be guided by God, through whatever level or steep road by which he may be pleased to conduct us, secure of finding in it eternal salvation. St. Teresa used to say, "Our Lord never sends a cross without rewarding it with some favour, when we accept it with resignation."

6. Oh! how great the peace of the soul whose will is in all things conformed to the will of God. Because she wishes only what he wills, she always obtains whatsoever she desires; for all that happens in the world happens by the will of God. Panormitano relates, that king Alphonsus (called the great) being asked whom he esteemed happy in this life, wisely answered: "He who abandons himself entirely to the divine will of God." And in reality, does not all our inquietude arise from this cause: that things do not happen according to our wishes, and that we resist the divine will? "A just punishment," says St. Bernard: "Ad justum legem Dei pertinuit, ut qui a Deo noluit suaviter regi, penaliter a seipso regeretur"—Ep. xxi. ad Chartus. God justly ordains that they who refused to be governed by him in peace should rule themselves amid difficulties and troubles. But on the other hand, they who only wish what God wills always find their wishes accomplished, and, therefore, are always in peace, as well in prosperity as in adversity. When, then, you see a person in sadness, tell her that she is sad because she is not resigned to the will of God. The saints, even in the midst of persecutions the most severe and torments the most painful, knew not what it was to be sad. And why? Because they were united to the divine will. "Whatsoever shall befall the just man, it shall not make him sad"—Prov. xii. 21. Hence, Cardinal Petrucci has wisely said, that this frail and fleeting world is but a scene of woes. Its most pleasing amusements and pleasures have the appearance of joys, and they are torments. But to follow Christ suffering appears painful, and it gives true joy.

7. Speaking of the saints, Salvian says: "Humiles sunt, hoc volunt; pauperes sunt paupertate delectantur; itaque quidquid acciderit, jam beati dicendi sunt." If they are humbled they desire their humiliations; if they are poor they delight in their poverty; hence, in every misfortune which befalls them they are content, and therefore they begin, even in this life, to enjoy beatitude. Crosses will certainly be painful to the senses, but this pain is in the interior part: in the superior part of the soul peace shall reign. The saints, says Father Rodriguez, are like Mount Olympus: at the base there are showers of rain and thunder-storms, but at the summit, which is raised above the middle region of the atmosphere, there is a perpetual calm. In a word, they are like Jesus our Saviour, who, in the midst of all the sorrows and ignominies of his passion, suffered no diminution of his peace. The more the saints suffer, the more they rejoice in spirit, knowing that in accepting their sufferings they please their Lord, whom alone they love. This David experienced when he said, "Thy rod and thy staff they have comforted me"—Ps. xxii. 4. St. Teresa says: "And what greater good can we acquire than a testimony that we please God?" Father Avila has written: "One 'Blessed be God' in adversity is of greater value than a thousand acts of thanksgiving in prosperity."

8. But such a religious says: I accept all the crosses which come to me from God, such as losses, pains, and infirmities; but how can I bear so much maltreatment and such unjust persecutions? They who thus persecute me are certainly guilty of sin, and God does not will sin. But, dear sister, do you not know that all comes from God? "Good things and evil, life and death.....are from God"—Eccl. xi. 14. Prosperity and adversity, life and death, come from the Lord. It is necessary to know that in every action there is a physical entity which belongs to the material part of the action, and a moral entity which appertains to reason: the moral entity of the action, or the sin of the person who persecutes you, belongs to his malice, but the physical entity appertains to the divine concurrence, so that God wills not the sin, but he wills that you suffer the persecution, and it is he that sends it When his cattle were taken away from Job, God did not will the sin of the plunderers, but he willed that Job should suffer the loss. Hence, Job said: "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away: as it hath pleased the Lord so is it done: blessed be the name of the Lord"—Job i. 21. St. Augustine remarks that Job did not say: the Lord gave, and the devil has taken away: but "The Lord gave, and the Lord has taken away"—In Ps. 32. The Lord did not wish the sin of the Jews who crucified Jesus Christ, but Jesus Christ said to St. Peter: "The chalice which my Father hath given me shall I not drink it?"—John xviii. 11. By these words he showed that his death was caused by the hands of the Jews, but that it was sent to him by his Eternal Father. St. Dorotheus says that they who, when maltreated, seek revenge against the man who maltreats them, imitate the dog that bites the stone by which he is struck, without attending to the hand by which it was thrown. In all the injuries which we receive from others we should recognise the hand of God, which sends evil to us, and thus resign ourselves to his holy will.

PRAYER.

My beloved Saviour, thou hast suffered so many sorrows and reproaches for my sake, and I, on account of the miseries of this life, have so often turned my back on thee. I thank thee for having waited for me till the present moment. Had I died in my sins I could never more love thee. Since I am now able to love thee I wish to love thee with my whole heart. Accept me, O my love, now that I return to thee full of tenderness and sorrow for the offences I have given thee. But if, when I despised thy love, thou didst not cease to seek after me, how can I fear that thou wilt cast me off now that I desire nothing but thy love? Thou hast borne with me so long that I might love thee. Yes, I wish to love thee. I love thee, my God, with my whole heart, and I feel greater sorrow for having hitherto offended thee than if I had suffered every other evil. O love of my soul! I wish never more to give thee any deliberate displeasure; and I wish to do all that thou dost wish me to do. Thy will shall henceforth be my only love. Make known to me what I must do in order to please thee: I wish to do it. I wish to love thee with a true love, and, therefore, I embrace all the tribulations which thou wilt send me. Chastise me in this life, that I may be able to love thee for eternity. My God, give me strength to be faithful to thee. Mary, my mother, to thee I recommend myself: do not cease to pray to Jesus for me. Amen.

SECTION II.

In what things we ought, in a special manner, to resign ourselves.

1. We have already seen the great efficacy of resignation to the divine will to render us dear to God, and to procure for us great good. Let us now come to the practice. In what things in particular must we resign ourselves? Let it be remembered, in the first place, that it is very useful to resign ourselves in small things: for example to suffer a painful word, an importunate fly, the barking of a dog, a trip in walking, the extinguishing of a candle, the tearing of a garment, and the like. It is of greater importance to bear these trifles than to submit to great crosses. First, because they are more frequent; secondly, because we thus more easily acquire a habit and facility of resigning ourselves to things that are difficult.

2. Secondly, let us be careful to practice resignation in our infirmities. They who desire to please God should desire the occasions of pleasing him, and, therefore, what the world calls misfortunes holy souls call graces, and graces so much the more valuable as they are painful and burdensome. The condition of the sick who suffer and are not conformed to the divine will is most pitiable and deplorable, not so much on account of their pains as because they know not how to appreciate the riches which God offers them in their sufferings. Miserable souls! they convert into poison the remedy of their evils; for bodily maladies are the most efficacious remedies for the cure of spiritual diseases. "The blueness of a wound," says the wise man, "shall wipe away evils"—Prov. xx. 30. But Father Balthassar Alvares says that they who are resigned in afflictions and pains run to an union with God, or draw God to an union with them, as the Lord himself revealed to St. Gertrude, saying that when he sees a soul in tribulation he feels himself drawn to her, and that his delights consist in remaining with the sick and afflicted. Of this David assures us in several places. "The Lord is nigh to them that are of a contrite heart"—Ps. xxxiii. 19. God rejoices in being near to those who are in tribulation. The Lord himself says: "I am with him in tribulation"—Ps. xc. 15. I am united with those who are in affliction.

3. In the time of sickness it is lawful, and even a duty, to take the remedies prescribed by the physician, because this is also the will of God; but we should afterwards resign ourselves entirely to the divine will. We may also pray to God for health, in order to employ it in his service; but we should leave ourselves in his hands that he may do with us what he pleases: and this is the best means of obtaining the restoration of health. They who seek in their prayers not God but themselves shall not be heard; but, on the other hand, he who in his petitions seeks God and the divine will shall certainly obtain what he asks. "I sought the Lord and he heard me"—Ps. xxxiii. 5. Our Lord appeared one day to St. Gertrude, who suffered great torture from fever, and asked if she wished for health. She embraced his heart and said: "This is what I wish for; I desire nothing but your holy will"—Op. S. Gertr. lib. 3, cap. 53. Oh! how efficacious a remedy for all infirmities is that beautiful prayer, thy will be done. St. Liduvina, nailed as it were to a bed, all sores and pains, used to say: "Lord, my pleasure is that you load me with pains, because my only consolation is to accomplish your will." A tepid soul cannot attain to this perfect spirit of resignation, but loving souls easily attain it. Oh! how consoling the sufferings which are borne with love! This is the sour sweet so palatable to souls enamoured of that God who rendered scourges, racks, and red-hot plates sweet to the martyrs. When, by order of the tyrant, the flesh of St. Epictetus was torn with hooks of iron, and his sides burned with lighted torches, the holy martyr repeated unceasingly: Lord, your will be done in me! Lord, your will be done in me!—Rosveid. in vit. PP. lib. 1. Thus he endured all his torments with peace. St. Bonaventure relates that at a time when St. Francis was greatly afflicted with pains, a simple-minded brother said to him: Father, ask of God to treat you with a little more tenderness, for his hand appears to be very heavy on you. St. Francis answered: "Brother, listen to me; did I not know that what you have said comes from simplicity, I would never see you more; for you wish to censure what God does." After these words, the Saint threw himself on the ground from the bed on which he lay, and kissing the floor, said: "My God, I thank you for these pains, and I beseech you to increase them, if it be pleasing to you; for I desire nothing else than to do your will"—Vit. c. i.

4. Thirdly, we should practice conformity to the divine will with regard to our natural defects; such as want of talent, defective memory, bad sight, bad hearing, bad health, little abilities for the offices of the community. To them who upbraid us with these defects we should say: "He made us and not we ourselves"—Ps. xcix. 3. And thus let us resign ourselves to the divine will. We are poor; we should be content with the alms which the Lord gives us. What would you think of a beggar who should complain that the garment which you give him is not as rich as he wishes, or that the food is not as delicious as he desires? Let us, then, be content with what God has given us, and seek nothing else. Could he not have left us in our nothingness? Could he not ordain that instead of being men, we should be toads, flies, or blades of grass? Oh! how often has the want of mental acuteness, of corporal beauty, or of other natural gifts, contributed to the salva tion of many. For to many the possession of such qualifications might be the occasion of their damnation. To how many have great talents, beauty, nobility, and wealth, been the cause of pride and haughtiness, and of running headlong into a multitude of crimes? Let us, then, desire only the goods which God wishes to give us and no more. Blessed Henry Suson used to say: "I would rather be the vilest animal on earth, in conformity with the will of God, than be a seraph with my own will." And though, on our part, we ought to aspire to the highest sanctity which we can attain, we should be content with that degree of perfection which God gives us.

5. Fourthly, we ought, in a special manner, to practice resignation in spiritual desolations, which are the severest trials to a soul that loves God. But be not disturbed at them, nor say: I would not be troubled if I knew that I am in desolation because God wills it; but I fear that the Lord has withdrawn from me, in punishment of my sins. Though your desolation be a chastisement, it is the will of God that you bear it; accept it, then, and you shall enjoy peace. To remove disquietude it is necessary to know that there are two sorts of aridity; one in the sensible part of the soul, the removal of which does not depend on us. This kind of aridity is not displeasing to God. The other is in the will (this is, properly speaking, voluntary tepidity,) and this we can remove. It is needless to treat here of this second kind of aridity, for I have said enough on it in the fifth and sixth chapters. But with regard to the first, we should not be disturbed though we see ourselves unable to raise the heart to God, to make acts of love, of contrition, and of conformity. It is enough to wish to perform them with a prompt will; and though they be made with dryness, without relish, and without feeling, God accepts them, and is pleased with them. When in our darkness we can do nothing else, let us at least annihilate ourselves before God; and confessing our miseries, let us cast ourselves into his hands, as we cast a stone from a mountain into a valley without knowing where it may go, and we shall find peace. But in every state in which we find ourselves, whether of darkness or of light, let us pray to God, saying: Lord, conduct me in any way you please; make me do your will, I wish for nothing else. The soul that is disturbed in aridity shows that she has not entirely abandoned herself to the divine will. St. Teresa used to say: "The sole end of those who practice mental prayer should be to conform their will to the will of God; and let them be persuaded that in this consists the highest perfection.

They who practice it best shall receive the greatest gifts from God. Hence St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi has well said that "the accomplishment of the divine will should be the object of all our prayers."

6. O blessed spouse of the Lord, accustom yourself in meditation to offer yourself always to God, to suffer for the love of him every spiritual or bodily pain, every desolation, every sorrow, infirmity, dishonour, or persecution; and beg of him always to give you strength to do in all things his holy will. Attend to the excellent admonition given by spiritual masters; when any serious calamity befalls you, there is no better subject for your mental prayer than the tribulation which has come upon you; and in your meditation be careful to make repeated acts of conformity to the divine will. The union of the will with God has been the continual exercise of the saints. Even in going to sleep, St. Peter of Alcantara would imagine himself at the point of death, and would repeat: "Lord, thy will be done in me." He would desire that every respiration during his repose should be an act of resignation. Oh! how pleasing to the Lord are such oblations and acts of conformity; not because he rejoices in our sufferings, but because he then knows how much we love him. When God commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac, he did not wish the death of the son, but he wished to know if Abraham was ready to do his will. What God wishes from us all is, that we keep our wills united to his. Some religious, by reading books on mystic theology, become desirous of the supernatural or passive union. I would wish that they should desire the active union, that is, perfect conformity to the will of God, in which, according to St. Teresa, the true union of the soul with God consists. They (adds the saint) who have only the active union, may have much greater merit, because this is accompanied with labour on their part, and the Lord conducts them as strong in virtue; he reserves what they do not enjoy here to give it to them all at once in heaven. Cardinal Petrucci also says, that without the gift of infused contemplation a soul may, with the ordinary grace alone, succeed in annihilating her own will, and in transforming it into the will of God. Hence, he concludes, that we should neither desire nor ask of God any other favour than the accomplishment of his will, in which all sanctity consists. We thus die to ourselves, that is, we renounce all our gratifications and desires, in order to make the divine will alone live in us. This is what the Apostle said: "And I live now, not I, but Christ liveth in me"—Gal. ii. 20. I live no longer in myself, but Jesus Christ lives in me; because I wish only what he wishes.

7. Endeavour, then, O blessed sister, in every occurrence, particularly in things that are painful to the senses, to have always in your mouth the words of our Saviour: "Yea, Father, for so hath it seemed good in thy sight"—Matt. xi. 26. Lord, let what has happened be done, for so it has pleased thee. A holy monk, as Cesarius relates (lib. 10, cap. 6,) performed many miracles. Being asked by his superior what were the extraordinary works for which God had bestowed upon him the gift of miracles, he answered: "I do nothing except that I endeavour to wish only what God wishes, and to accept everything from his hands." But, said the abbot, were you not disturbed at the great injury we sustained from such an enemy a few days ago? "No," replied the monk, "because I regarded it as permitted by the divine will." From this the abbot perceived why the good religious was so dear to God. Thus, also, when tormented with the fear of any grievous calamity which may befall you, say immediately: Lord, I wish what you wish; do what you please with me, and with all I possess. St. Gregory relates (Dial. lib. 3, cap. 16,) that the devil, in the form of a serpent, tormented a religious for three years; the religious, though he suffered a good deal, never lost his peace, but would say to the enemy: "Do with me what you wish, if such be the will and pleasure of God." Let your continual prayer be: "Thy will be done." At rising in the morning, in going to bed at night, in meditation, at communion, at the visit to the most holy sacrament, always say: "Thy will be done—thy will be done." St. Gertrude used to say three hundred times in the day: "My Jesus, let not my will but thine be done."

8. Happy you if you do the same; that is, if you are always resigned to the divine will. Truly happy shall be your life, and still more happy your death. Blosius says, that he who at the moment of death, makes an act of perfect conformity to the divine will, shall be delivered, not only from hell, but also from purgatory, though he had been guilty of all the sins of the whole world. "Hoc si facere potuerit, neque infernum, neque purgatorium subibit, etiamsi totius mundi peccata commisisset"—Blos. de cons. pusil. c. 34, sec. 2. The reason is, that he who accepts death with perfect resignation, acquires merit, similar to that of the holy martyrs, who spontaneously gave their lives for Jesus Christ. Moreover, he who dies with perfect conformity to the divine will, dies in peace and joy, even in the midst of pains. A Cistercian monk was seized with his last illness; his flesh became rotten, and his pains were so excruciating, that he suffered a continual death; but the good religious unceasingly thanked the Lord, and enjoyed uninterrupted tranquillity and consolation. When near his last breath, and racked with increased torture, he began to sing. The monks who stood round his bed were astonished to see such joy amid so many pains; but his cheerfulness continued to the last moment, and thus with joy and jubilation he happily closed his life. "To them that love God, all things work together unto good"—Rom. viii. 28. To him who loves God all things are an occasion of merit and consolation; for it is certain that God sends us crosses only for our welfare. This he himself said one day to St. Catherine of Sienna: I can wish only what is useful to you. As I have freely created man, so I have loved him infinitely. Hence, you will infer, that I ordain tribulations for your good, which I desire more ardently than you yourself wish it. Another holy woman died, consumed by an ulcer, which had entirely changed her appearance. The bishop who assisted her, could not restrain his tears when he saw her agony; but she smiled, and was surprised to see the bishop weeping. The prelate, on the other hand, was astonished to see her smiling, and said to her: Why do you smile? She answered: Tell me, were a princess confined in a dungeon, informed that she could not return to her palace till the prison was destroyed, how great would be her joy at seeing its walls falling to the ground? Thus, because I find myself near my deliverance from this prison of my body, I rejoice and smile.

9. I do not dilate much on this subject of conformity to the will of God (on which I would never cease to speak,) because I have already written a little treatise on it, which I pray you to procure, and read several times; for it is certainly in uniting ourselves to the divine will, that all our salvation, peace, and perfection consist. "And life in his good will"—Ps. xxix. 6.

10. Lastly, I entreat you to perform all that you do for the sole motive of doing the will of God, for thus you shall never be disturbed when things do not happen according to our wishes. Thus you shall be always in peace, and shall always give pleasure to God. Oh! how delightful a thing it is to please God! Do you wish to know what is meant by giving pleasure to God? I will tell you in the words of the venerable father D. Anthony Torres: "It means to please that loving heart to which we owe so much; to gratify those divine eyes, always solicitous for our welfare; to satisfy that will always employed with the love of us. To give pleasure to God is the end for which he has created us, the goal to which our desires should tend: the rule which ought to be the measure of our existence. To give pleasure to God, is that which is most ardently sought by the Saints; that which moved so many holy virgins to consecrate themselves to him in the cloister, which sent so many anchorets to the deserts. This made the persecuted insensible to calumnies and reproaches, and rendered sweet to the martyrs torments and death. To give pleasure to God is that for which an enlightened soul offers herself to every kind of spoilation, to all sorrows—to all even the worst calumnies, to all deaths the most painful, and to hell itself. To give pleasure to God is such, that every one should prefer it to all self-interest, to all felicity. It is such, that if the very blessed in paradise knew that it would give greater pleasure to God that they should be in hell than in heaven, they would all (and the first should be the most holy Virgin,) cast themselves into hell, there to find, in the midst of these eternal torments, the greater pleasure of God. This is what is meant by giving greater pleasure to God."

PRAYER.

My Jesus, have mercy on me: miserable that I have been! How often, in order to follow my own will against thine, have I voluntarily condemned myself to hell? Hadst thou then taken me out of life I should now remain in that pit for ever, to curse and hate thy will. But no: I now bless it, I love it: I wish always to love it. My Redeemer, pardon me; I will not contradict thee any more; tell me what thou wishest from me, and give me strength; I wish to do thy will. "Thy will be done." Make me do thy will perfectly during the remainder of my life, and I ask nothing more. Ah! my sweet love, what else dost thou wish but my welfare and my salvation? Eternal Father, for the love of Jesus Christ, who has taught me to pray to thee in his name, I ask this grace of thee. "Thy will be done in me! Thy will be done in me! Thy will be done in me!" O happy shall I be if I live and terminate life doing thy will. O Mary, happy thou who hast always done the will of God perfectly. Oh! my mother, obtain for me by thy prayers the grace that I may fulfil the divine will during all the remaining moments of my life: this grace I hope for through thy intercession. Amen.

CHAPTER XV.

ON MENTAL PRAYER.

SECTION I.

Moral necessity of mental prayer for Religious.

1. The life of a religious must be a life of prayer. It is difficult, or to speak more correctly, it is morally impossible for a religious who is not a lover of mental prayer to be a good religious. If you see a tepid religious, say that she does not make mental prayer, and you shall say the truth. The devil labours hard to make religious lose the love for meditation; and should he conquer them in this he will gain all. St. Philip Neri used to say—a religious without mental prayer is a religious without reason. I add: she is not a religious, but the corpse of a religious. In the first place, without mental prayer a religious is without light. They, says St. Augustine, who keep their eyes shut cannot see the way to their country. The eternal truths are all spiritual things, which are seen not with the eyes of the body, but with the eyes of the mind, that is, by reflection and consideration. Now, they who do not make mental prayer do not see these truths, neither do they see the importance of eternal salvation, and the means which they must adopt in order to obtain it. The loss of so many souls arises from the neglect of considering the great affair of our salvation, and what we must do in order to be saved. "With desolation," says the prophet Jeremias, "is all the land made desolate: because there is none that considereth in the heart"—Jer. xii. 11. On the other, the Lord says that he who keeps before his eyes the truths of faith, that is death, judgment, and the happy or unhappy eternity that awaits us, shall never fall into sin. "In all thy works remember thy last end, and thou shalt never sin" —Eccl. vii. 40. "Draw near to God," says David, "and you shall be enlightened. Come ye to him and be enlightened"—Ps. xxxiii. 6. In another place our Saviour says: "Let your loins be girt, and lamps burning in your hands" —Luke xii. 35. These lamps are, according to St. Bonaventure, holy meditations: "Oratio est lucerna," for in prayer the Lord speaks to us and enlightens us, in order to show us the way of salvation. "Thy word is a lamp to my feet"—Ps. cxviii. 105.

2. St. Bonaventure also says that mental prayer is, as it were, a mirror in which we see all the stains of the soul. In a letter to the Bishop of Osma, St. Teresa says, "although it appears to us that we have no imperfections, still when God opens the eyes of the soul, as he usually does in prayer, our imperfections are then clearly seen"—Let. 8. He who does not make mental prayer does not even know his defects, "and therefore," as St. Bernard says, "he does not abhor them." "Seipsum non exhorret quia non sentit." He does not even know the dangers to which his eternal salvation is exposed, and therefore he does not even think of avoiding them. But he who applies himself to meditation instantly sees his faults, and the dangers of perdition, and seeing them, will reflect on the remedies for them. By meditating on eternity David was excited to the practice of virtue and to sorrow and works of penance for his sins. "I thought upon the days of old, and I had in my mind the eternal years ..... and I was exercised, and I swept my spirit"—lxxiv. 6. The spouse in the Canticles said: "The flowers have appeared in our land: the time of pruning is come: the voice of the turtle is heard in our land"—Cant. ii. 12. When the soul, like the solitary turtle, retires and recollects herself in meditation to converse with God, then the flowers, that is good desires, appear: then comes the time of pruning, that is, the correction of faults which are discovered in mental prayer. "Consider," says St. Bernard, "that the time of pruning is at hand, if the time of meditation has gone before"—De cons. lib. 2, c. vi. For (says the saint in another place,) meditation regulates the affections, directs the actions, and corrects defects. "Consideratio regit affectus, dirigit actus, corrigit excessus"—S. Ber. ibid., lib. 1, c. vii.

3. Secondly, without meditation there is not strength to resist the temptations of our enemies, and to practice the virtues of the gospel. Meditation is like fire with regard to iron, which when cold is hard, and can be wrought only with difficulty. But placed in the fire it becomes soft, and the workman gives it any form he wishes. "Faber," says the venerable Bartholomew a martyribus, "ignitum ferrum ictibus molliere satagit"—De Grad. Doctr. Spir. c. xxvi. To observe the divine precepts and counsels it is necessary to have a tender heart, that is, a heart docile and prepared to receive the impressions of celestial inspirations, and ready to obey them. It was this that Solomon asked of God—"Give, therefore, to thy servant an understanding heart"—3 Kings iii. 9. Sin has made our heart hard and indocile; for being altogether inclined to sensual pleasures it resists, as the apostle complained, the laws of the spirit. "But I see another law in my members fighting against the law of my mind"—Rom. vii. 23. But the soul is rendered docile and tender to the influence of grace which is communicated in mental prayer. By the contemplation of the divine goodness, the great love which God has borne him, and the immense benefits which God has bestowed upon him, man is inflamed with love, his heart is softened, and made obedient to the divine inspirations. But without mental prayer his heart will remain hard and restive, and disobedient, and thus he shall be lost. "A hard heart shall fare evil at the last"—Eccl. iii. 27. Hence, St. Bernard exhorted Pope Eugenius never to omit meditation on account of external occupations. "I fear for you, O Eugenius, lest the multitude of affairs (prayer and consideration being intermitted) may bring you to a hard heart, which abhors not itself, because it perceives it not"—St. Bern. lib. 1. de cons. ad Eug.

4. Some may imagine that the long time which devout souls give to prayer, and which they could spend in useful works, is unprofitable and lost time. But such persons know not that in mental prayer souls acquire strength to conquer enemies and to practice virtue. "From this leisure," says St. Bernard, "strength comes forth." Hence the Lord commanded that his spouse should not be disturbed. "I adjure you.....that you stir not up nor awake my beloved till she please"—Cant. iii. 5. He says until she please: for the sleep or repose which the soul takes in mental prayer is perfectly voluntary, but is at the same time necessary for her spiritual life. He who does not sleep has not strength to work, nor to walk, but goes tottering along the way. The soul that does not repose and acquire strength in meditation, is not able to resist temptations and totters on the road. In the life of the venerable sister Mary Crucified (lib. 2, c. 8,) we read, that while at prayer she heard a devil boasting that he had made a nun omit the common medita tion, and that afterwards, in consequence of his continuing to tempt her, she was in danger of consenting to mortal sin. The servant of God ran to the nun, and with the divine aid rescued her from the criminal suggestion. Behold the danger to which a religious, who omits meditation, exposes her soul! St. Teresa used to say that he who neglects mental prayer needs not a devil to carry him to hell, but that he brings himself there with his own hands. And the Abbot Diocles said, that the man who omits mental prayer soon becomes either a beast or a devil.

5. Without petitions on our part God does not grant the divine helps; and without aid from God we cannot observe the commandments; hence, the Apostle exhorts his disciples to pray always. "Pray without ceasing"—1 Thess. v. 17. We are poor mendicants: "I am a beggar and poor"—Ps.

xxxix. The entire revenue of the poor consists in asking alms from the rich; and our riches also consist in prayer, that is in the prayers of petition; for by prayer we obtain from God his graces. "Without prayer," says St. Chrysostom "it is absolutely impossible to lead a good life." "Simpliciter impossibile absque precationis præsidio cum virtue degere." And, says the learned Monsignor Abelly, what but the neglect of mental prayer can be the cause of the great relaxation of morals which we witness? God has an ardent desire to enrich us with his graces; but, as it were, forced by prayers to grant them to us. "God," says the holy doctor, "wishes to be asked, he wishes to be compelled, he wishes to be overcome by a certain importunity"—S. Greg. in Ps. Pœnit. 6. According to St. Chrysostom, it is impossible for him who attends to prayer to fall into sin. "Impossibile est hominem congruo precantem studo unquam peccare"—Hom. 79, at pop. Antioch. And in another place he says that when the devils see that we pray they immediately cease to tempt us. "Si nos compererint deprecatione munitos, illico resiliunt"—Chry. lib. 1, de orando Deo.

6. From the absolute necessity of the prayer of petition arises the moral necessity of mental prayer: for he who neglects meditation, and is distracted with worldly affairs, shall not know his spiritual wants, the dangers to which his salvation is exposed, the means which he must adopt in order to conquer temptations, or even the necessity of the prayer of petition for all men; thus he shall give up the practice of prayer, and by neglecting to ask God's graces he will certainly be lost. The great bishop Palafox, in his "Annotations to the letters of St. Teresa," says (lib. 8, n. 10:) "How can charity last unless God gives perseverance? How will the Lord give us perseverance if we neglect to ask him for it? And how shall we ask him without mental prayer? Without mental prayer there is not the communication with God which is necessary for the preservation of virtue." And Cardinal Bellarmine says that for him who neglects meditation it is morally impossible to live without sin. Some one may say: I do not make mental prayer, but I say many vocal prayers. But it is necessary to know, as St. Augustine remarks, that to obtain the divine grace it is not enough to pray with the tongue, it is necessary also to pray with the heart. On the words of David: "I cried to the Lord with my voice"—Ps. cxli., the holy doctor says: "Many cry not with their own voice (that is, not with the interior voice of the soul,) but with that of the body. Your thoughts are a cry to the Lord. Cry within, where God hears"—In Ps. v. 30. This is what the Apostle inculcates. "Praying at all times in the spirit"—Eph. vi. 18. In general, vocal prayers are said distractedly with the voice of the body, but not of the heart, especially when they are long, and still more especially when said by a person who does not make mental prayer; and therefore God seldom hears them, and seldom grants the graces asked. Many say the rosary, the Office of the Blessed Virgin, and perform other works of devotion; but they still continue in sin. But it is impossible for him who perseveres in mental prayer to continue in sin; he will either give up meditation or renounce sin. A great servant of God used to say that mental prayer and sin cannot exist together. And this we see by experience; they who make mental prayer rarely incur the enmity of God; and should they ever have the misfortune of falling into sin, by persevering in mental prayer they see their misery and return to God. Let a soul, says St. Teresa, be ever so negligent, if she persevere in meditation the Lord will bring her back to the haven of salvation.

7. In a word, all the saints have become saints by mental prayer. Mental prayer is the blessed furnace in which souls are inflamed with the divine love. "In my meditation," says David, "a fire shall flame out"—Ps. xxxviii. 4. St. Vincent of Paul used to say that it would be a miracle if a sinner who attends at the sermons in the mission, or in the spiritual exercises, were not converted. Now he who preaches and speaks in the exercises is only a man; but it is God himself that speaks to the soul in meditation. "I will lead her into the wilderness; and I will speak to her heart"—Osee ii. 14. St. Catherine of Bologna used to say: "He who does not practice mental prayer deprives himself of the bond that unites the soul with God; hence, finding her alone, the devil will easily make her his own." "How," she would say, "can I conceive that the love of God is found in the soul that cares but little to treat with God in prayer? And where but in meditation have the saints been inflamed with divine love? By means of mental prayer St. Peter of Alcantara was inflamed to such a degree that, in order to cool himself, he ran into a frozen pool, and the frozen water began to boil like water in a caldron placed on the fire. In mental prayer St. Philip Neri became inflamed, and trembled so that he shook the entire room. In mental prayer St. Lewis Gonzaga was so inflamed with divine ardour that his very face appeared to be on fire, and his heart beat as strongly as if it wished to fly from the body. "Ex oratione," says St. Laurence Justinian, "fugatur tentatio, absedit tristitia, virtus reparatur, excitatur fervor, et divini amoris flamma succrescit"—De cast. Con. c. 22, n. 4. By the efficacy of mental prayer, temptation is banished, sadness is driven away, lost virtue is restored, fervour which has grown cold is excited, and the lovely flame of divine love is augmented. Hence, St. Lewis Gonzaga has justly said that he who does not make much mental prayer shall never attain a high degree of perfection.

8. A man of prayer (says David) is like a tree planted near the current of waters, which brings forth fruit in due time; all his actions prosper before God. "Blessed is the man ..... who shall meditate on his law day and night! And he shall be like a tree which is planted near the running waters, which shall bring forth its fruit in due season, and his leaf shall not fall off; and all whatsoever he shall do shall prosper"—Ps. i. 3. Mark the words, in due season, that is at the time when he ought to bear such a pain, such an affront, etc. St. John Chrysostom compared mental prayer to a fountain in the middle of a garden. Oh! what an abundance of flowers and verdant plants do we see in the garden which is always refreshed with water from the fountain. Such, precisely, is the soul that practices mental prayer: you will see that she always advances in good desires, and that she always brings forth more abundant fruits of virtue. Whence does she receive so many blessings? From meditation, by which she is continually irrigated. "Thy plants are a paradise of pomegranates with the fruits of the orchard ..... the fountain of gardens, the well of living waters, which runs with a strong stream from Libanus"—Cant. iv. 13, etc. But let the fountains cease to water the garden, and, behold, the flowers, plants, and all instantly wither away; and why? Because the water has failed. You will see that as long as such a religious makes mental prayer, she is modest, humble, devout, and mortified in all things. But let her omit meditation, and you shall instantly find her wanting in modesty of the eyes, proud, resenting every word, indevout, no longer frequenting the sacraments and the church; you shall find her attached to vanity, to useless conversations, to pastimes, and to earthly pleasures: and why? The water has failed, and therefore fervour has ceased. "My soul is as earth without water unto thee ..... My spirit has fainted away"—Ps. cxlii. 6, etc. She has neglected mental prayer; the garden is therefore dried up, and the miserable soul goes from bad to worse. When a soul abandons meditation, St. Chrysostom regards her not only as sick but as dead. "He," says the holy doctor, "who prays not to God, nor desires to enjoy assiduously his divine conversation, is dead ..... The death of the soul is not to be prostrated before God"—Lib. 1. de orando Deo.

9. The same father says that mental prayer is the root of the fruitful vine: "Radix vitis frugiferæ." And St. John Climachus writes, that "prayer is a bulwark against the assault of afflictions, the spring of virtues, the procurer of graces"—Gradu. 29. Rufinus asserts, that all the spiritual progress of the soul flows from mental prayer. "Omnis profectus spiritualis ex meditatione procedit"—Ps. xxxvi. And Gerson goes so far as to say, that he who neglects meditation cannot, without a miracle, lead the life of a Christian. "Absque meditationis exercito nullus, secluso miraculo Dei ad Christianæ religionis normam attingit"—De medit. cons. 7. Speaking of mental prayer, Jeremias said: "Sedebit solitarius, et tacebit, levavit se super se"—Thr. iii. 28. That is, a soul cannot have a relish for God unless she withdraws from creatures, and sits, that is, stops to contemplate the goodness, the love, the amiableness of her God. But when solitary and recollected in meditation, that is, when she takes away her thoughts from the world, she is then raised above herself: "levavit se super se;" and departs from prayer very different from what she was when she commenced it. St Ignatius of Loyola used to say, that mental prayer is the short way to attain perfection. In a word, he who advances most in meditation makes the greatest progress in perfection. In mental prayer the soul is filled with holy thoughts, with holy affections, desires, and holy resolutions, and with love for God. There she sacrifices her passions, her appetites, her earthly attachments, and all the interests of self-love. Moreover, by praying for them in mental prayer we can save many sinners, as was done by a St. Teresa, a St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, and is done by all souls enamoured of God, who never omit in their meditations to recommend to him all infidels, heretics, and all poor sinners; begging him also to give zeal to priests who work in his vineyard, that they may convert his enemies. In mental prayer we can also, by the sole desire of performing them, gain the merit of many good works which we do not perform. For, as the Lord punishes bad desires, so, on the other hand, he rewards all our good desires.

10. It is necessary, above all, to be careful not to go to mental prayer in order to enjoy consolation and tenderness; but for the purpose of pleasing God, and of learning from him how he wishes to be loved and served by us. Father Balthassar Alvarez used to say: The love of God consists not in receiving his favours, but in serving him through the sole motive of pleasing him. And he would say that divine consolation is like the refreshment which we take on a journey, not to rest in it, but in order to go forward with greater vigour. When you feel aridity in meditation, be careful to persevere, in spite of all the tediousness which you experience, and know that you then give great pleasure to your spouse and acquire great merits. Say to him then: O my Jesus, why dost thou treat me thus? Thou hast stripped me of all things, of property, of relatives, of my will, and I have been satisfied with these privations in order to gain thee; but why dost thou now deprive me also of thyself? Say this to him with an humble affection; he will make thee feel that he does all because he loves thee and for thy greater good. Father Torres used to say: To carry the cross with Jesus, without consolation, makes the soul run and fly to perfection.

PRAYER.

My Jesus, thou hast loved me in the midst of pains; and in the midst of sufferings I wish to love thee. Thou hast spared nothing; thou hast even given thy blood and thy life in order to gain my love; and shall I continue as hitherto, to be reserved in loving thee? No, my Redeemer, it shall not be so; the ingratitude with which I have hitherto treated thee is sufficient. To thee I consecrate my whole heart. Thou alone dost deserve all my love. Thee alone do I wish to love. My God, since thou wishest me to be entirely thine, give me strength to serve thee as thou deservest during the remainder of my life. Pardon my tepidity and my past infidelities. How often have I omitted mental prayer in order to indulge my caprice. Alas! how often, when it was in my power to remain with thee in order to please thee, have I remained with creatures so as to offend thee. Oh! that so many lost years returned! But since they will not return, the remaining days of my life must be entirely thine, O my beloved Lord. I love thee, O my Jesus! I love thee, O my Sovereign good! Thou art and shalt be for ever the only love of my soul. O mother of fair love, O Mary, obtain for me the grace to love thy Son, and to spend the remainder of my life in his love. Thou dost obtain from Jesus whatsoever thou wishest; through thy prayers I hope for this gift. Amen.

SECTION II.

On the practice of Mental Prayer.

1. HAVING seen the great necessity of mental prayer for religious, and the great blessings which they may draw from it, let us now consider the practice of meditation with regard to the place, the time, and the manner. First, with regard to the place, it should be solitary. "But," said our Saviour, "when thou shalt pray, enter into thy chamber, and having shut the door, pray to the Father in secret"—Matt. vi. 6. When you wish to pray, shut yourself up in your chamber, and thus pray to your Father. St. Bernard says, that silence and the absence of all noise almost force the soul to think of the goods of heaven. "Silentium, et a strepitu quies, cogit cœlestia meditari." To make mental prayer, the best place is, as has been said, your own chamber; but for religious, the most appropriate place is the church, in presence of the blessed sacrament. Father Avila used to say, that he knew no sanctuary more desirable than a church, in which Jesus Christ remains in the holy Eucharist. In order to make mental prayer well, it is necessary to unite with the external silence interior silence, that is, detachment from earthly affections. Speaking of certain persons attached to the world, our Lord said one day to St. Teresa: "I would wish to speak to them, but creatures make such a noise in their ears that they do not give me a moment in which I can make them listen to me." But in the next chapter, on the solitude of the heart, we shall speak at length on this point.

2. With regard to the time of making mental prayer, St. Isidore used to say, that ordinarily speaking the fittest time for meditation is the morning and evening. "Mane et vespere tempus orationis opportunum"—De sum. bono., cap. vii. But, according to St. Gregory, the morning is the most seasonable time for prayer, because, says the saint, when prayer precedes business, sin shall not get admission into the soul. "Si oratio negotio præcesserit, peccatum aditum nun inveniet." The venerable Father D. Charles Caraffa, founder of the congregation of the Pii Operarii, used to say also, that a fervent act of love made in the morning during meditation, is sufficient to maintain the soul in fervour during the whole day. Prayer, as St. Jerome has written, is also necessary in the evening. "Non prius corpus quiescat quam anima vescatur"—Ep. 22, ad. Eustoch. Let not the body go to rest before the soul is refreshed by mental prayer, which is the food of the soul. But in all times and in all places religious can pray, even at work or at recreation; it is enough for them then to raise the mind to God, and to make good acts, for in this consists mental prayer.

3. With regard to the time to be spent in mental prayer, the rule of the saints was to devote to it all the hours which were not necessary for the occupations of human life. St. Francis Borgia employed eight hours in the day in meditation, because his superiors would not allow him a longer time, and when the eight hours were expired, he earnestly asked permission to remain a little longer at prayer, saying—Ah! give me another little quarter of an hour. St. Philip Neri was accustomed to spend the entire night in prayer. St. Anthony the Abbot remained the whole night at prayer; and when the sun appeared (which was the time assigned for terminating his prayer,) he complained of it for having risen too soon. Father Balthassar Alvarez used to say, that a soul that loves God, when not in prayer, is like a stone out of its centre, in a violent state; for in this life we should, as much as possible, imitate the life of the saints in bliss, who are constantly employed in the contemplation of God. It is right to observe that with regard to the posture, the fittest one is kneeling; but when it causes pain and distraction a person may, as St. John of the Cross says, make meditation sitting in a modest posture.

4. But let us come to the particular time which a religious who seeks perfection should devote to mental prayer. Father Torres prescribed for religious who were his penitents an hour's meditation in the morning, another during the day, and a half hour's meditation in the evening, when they should not be hindered by sickness or by any duty of obedience. If to you this appears too much, I counsel you, at least, to give to mental prayer an hour in addition to the time devoted to it by the community. Sometimes the Lord wishes you to omit prayer in order to perform some work of fraternal charity; but it is necessary to attend to what St. Laurence Justinian says: "Cum charitas urget, se exponit proximo: sic tamen ut continue anhelet ad cubilis sponsi reditum"—De Casto. Conjug. cap. xi. n. 7. When charity requires it, the spouse of Jesus goes to serve her neighbour; but during that time she continually sighs to return to converse with her spouse in the solitude of her cell. Father Vincent Caraffa, General of the Society of Jesus, stole as many little moments of time as he could, and employed them in prayer.

5. Mental prayer is tedious to the religious who is attached to the world, but not to those who love God alone. Now, how can it be said that a religious loves God alone when she feels no tediousness in conversing for two hours with a relative, or an acquaintance at the grate, and cannot bring herself to make an hour's meditation in addition to the meditations made by the community? Ah! conversation with God is not painful or tedious to those who truly love him. "Non enim habet amaritudinem conversatio illius, nec tædium convictus illius, sed lætitiam, et gaudium" —Sap. viii. 16. His conversation has no bitterness, his company produces not tediousness, but joy and gladness. Mental prayer, says St. John Climacus, is nothing else than familiar conversation and union with God. "Oratio est familiaris conversatio et conjunctio cum Deo"—Gradu. xxviii. In prayer, as St. Chrysostom says, the soul converses with God, and God with the soul. No, the life of holy religious who love prayer, and fly from earthly amusements, is not a life of bitterness. If you do not believe me, "taste and see that the Lord is sweet"—Ps. xxxiii. 9. Try it, and you shall see how sweet the Lord is to those who leave all things in order to converse with him alone. But the end which we ought to propose to ourselves in going to meditation should be, as has been said several times, not spiritual consolation, but to learn from our Lord what he wishes from us, and to divest ourselves of all self-love. "To prepare yourself for prayer," says St. John Climacus, "put off your own will"—Gradu. xxviii. To prepare ourselves well for meditation we must renounce self-will, and say to God: "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth"—1 Kings iii. 10. Lord, tell me what you wish me to do, I am willing to do it. And it is necessary to say this with a resolute will, for without this disposition the Lord will not speak to us.

6. As to the manner of making mental prayer, I will suppose that you are already instructed in it; but allow me to explain briefly the principal parts of mental prayer for any young beginner into whose hands this book may fall. Mental prayer contains three parts: the preparation, the meditation, and the conclusion. In the preparation there are three acts: an act of faith, of the presence of God, and of adoration; an act of humility and of sorrow for our sins, and a petition for light. They may be made in the following manner: "My God, I believe thee present within me; I adore thee with my whole soul." Be careful to make this act with a lively faith, for a lively remembrance of the divine presence contributes greatly to remove distractions. The great servant of God, Cardinal D'Innico Carracciolo, bishop of Aversa, used to say, that when a person is distracted in meditation, there is reason to think that he has not made a lively act of faith. 2. "Lord, I should now be in hell, in punishment of the offences I have offered to thee. I am sorry for them from the bottom of my heart; have mercy on me. 3. Eternal Father, for the sake of Jesus and Mary, give me light in this meditation, that I may draw fruit from it." We must then recommend ourselves to most holy Mary, by saying an Ave Maria; to St. Joseph, to our guardian angel, and to our holy patron. These acts, says St. Francis de Sales, ought to be made with fervour, but should be short, that we may pass immediately to the meditation.

7. In entering on the meditation we must take leave of all extraneous thoughts, saying with St. Bernard: "Epectate his cogitationes meæ." O my thoughts! wait here: after prayer we shall speak on other matters. Be careful not to allow the mind to wander where it wishes, but should a distracting thought enter, we must not be disturbed, nor seek to banish it with a violent effort, but let us remove it calmly and return to God. Let us remember that the devil labours hard to disturb us in the time of meditation, in order to make us abandon it. Let him, then, who omits mental prayer on account of distractions, be persuaded that he gives delight to the devil. It is impossible, says Cassian, that our minds should be free from all distractions during prayer. Let us, then, never give up meditation, however great our distractions may be. St. Francis de Sales says, that if, in mental prayer, we should do nothing else than continually banish distractions and temptations, the meditation is well made. And before him, St. Augustine taught, that involuntary distractions do not take away the fruit of mental prayer. "Evagatio mentis quæ fit præter propositum, orationis fructum non tollit"—In reg. 3. When we perceive that we are deliberately distracted, let us desist from the voluntary defect, and banish the distraction, but let us be careful not to discontinue our meditation.

8. With regard to the subject matter of meditation, the best rule is to meditate on the truths or mysteries in which the soul finds most nourishment and devotion. But above all, for a religious who loves perfection, the most appropriate subject is the passion of Jesus Christ. Blosius writes, that our Lord revealed to several holy women, to St. Gertrude, St. Bridget, St. Matilda, and St. Catherine of Sienna, that they who meditate on his passion are very dear to him. According to St. Francis de Sales, the passion of our Redeemer should be the ordinary subject of the meditations of every Christian: how much more should it be the subject of the meditations of the spouse of Jesus Christ? Oh! what an excellent book is the passion of Jesus? There we understand better than in any other book the malice of sin, and also the mercy and love of God for man. You may read for your meditation, the devout reflections which I have published on what the holy evangelists have written concerning the passion of our Saviour. To me it appears that Jesus Christ has suffered so many different pains, the scourging, the crowning with thorns, the crucifixion, etc., that having before our eyes so many painful mysteries, we might have a variety of different subjects for meditating on his passion, by which we might excite sentiments of gratitude and love. When she is alone at meditation, a religious will do well always to make mental prayer with the aid of a book. St. Teresa used a book for seventeen years: she would first read a little, and then meditate for a short time on what she had read: it is useful to meditate in this manner, in imitation of the pigeon, that first drinks and then raises her eyes to heaven.

9. However, let it be remembered, that the advantage of mental prayer consists not so much in meditating as in making affections, petitions, and resolutions: these are the three principal fruits of meditation. "The progress of a soul," says St. Teresa, "does not consist in thinking much of God, but in loving him ardently; and this love is acquired by resolving to do a great deal for him." Speaking of mental prayer, the spiritual masters say, that meditation is, as it were, the needle, which, when it has passed must be succeeded by the golden thread, composed, as has been said, of affections, resolutions, and petitions. When you have reflected on the point of meditation, and feel any pious sentiment, raise your heart to God, and offer him acts of humility, or of confidence, or of thanksgiving, but above all, repeat in mental prayer acts of contrition and of love. The act of love (as also the act of contrition) is the golden chain which binds the soul to God. An act of perfect charity is sufficient for the remission of all our sins. "Charity covereth a multitude of sins"—1 Pet. iv. 8. The Lord has declared, that he cannot hate the soul that loves him: "I love them that love me"—Prov. viii. 17. The venerable sister, Mary Crucified (Life, chap. 10,) once saw a globe of fire in which some straws that had been thrown into it, were instantly consumed. By this vision she was given to understand, that a soul, by making a true act of love, obtains the remission of all her faults. Besides, the angelic doctor teaches, that by every act of love we acquire a new degree of glory. "Every act of charity," says the Saint, "merits eternal life." Acts of love may be made in the following manner: "My God, I esteem thee more than all things. I love thee with my whole heart. I delight in thy felicity. I would wish to see thee loved by all. I wish only what thou wishest. Make known to me what thou wishest from me, and I will do it. Dispose as thou pleasest of me and of all that I possess." This last act of oblation is particularly dear to God. St. Teresa was accustomed to offer herself to God in this manner at least fifty times in the day. Remember, that in this chapter we speak of the ordinary mental prayer; for should a soul feel herself at any time united to God by supernatural or infused recollection, without any particular thought of an eternal truth, or of any divine mystery, she should not then labour to perform any other acts than those which she feels herself sweetly drawn to God. It is then enough to endeavour, with loving attention, to remain united with God, without impeding the divine operation, or forcing herself to make reflections and acts. But this is to be understood when the Lord calls the soul to this supernatural prayer but until we receive such a call, we should not depart from the ordinary method of mental prayer, but should, as has been said, make use of meditation and affections. However, for persons accustomed to mental prayer, it is better to employ themselves in affections than in considerations.

10. Moreover, in mental prayer it is very profitable, and perhaps more useful than any other act, to repeat petitions to God, asking with humility and confidence his graces, that is, his light, resignation, perseverance, and the like; but above all, the gift of his holy love. St. Francis de Sales used to say, that by obtaining the divine love we obtain all graces; for a soul that truly loves God with her whole heart will, of herself, without being admonished by others, abstain from giving him the smallest displeasure, and will labour to please him to the best of her ability. When you find yourself in aridity and darkness, so that you feel, as it were, incapable of making good acts, it is sufficient to say: My Jesus, mercy. Lord, for the sake of thy mercy, assist me. And the meditation made in this manner, will be for you perhaps the most useful and fruitful. The venerable Paul Segneri used to say, that until he studied theology, he employed himself during the time of mental prayer in making reflections and affections; "but God (these are his own words) afterwards opened my eyes, and thenceforward I endeavoured to employ myself in petitions; and if there is any good in me, I ascribe it to this exercise of recommending myself to God." Do you likewise do the same; ask of God his graces, in the name of Jesus Christ, and you shall obtain whatsoever you desire. This our Saviour has promised, and his promise cannot fail: "Amen, amen, I say to you, if you ask the Father anything in my name, he will give it you"—John xvi. 23. In a word, for you, religious, all your mental prayer should consist in acts and petitions. Hence, the venerable sister Mary Crucified, while in a ecstasy, declared that mental prayer is the respiration of the soul; for, as by respiration the air is first attracted, and afterwards given back, so by petitions the soul first receives grace from God, and then by good acts of oblation and love she gives herself to him.

11. In terminating the meditation, it is necessary to make a particular resolution; as, for example, to avoid some particular defect into which you have more frequently fallen, or to practice some virtue, such as to suffer the annoyance which you receive from a sister, to obey more exactly a certain religious, to perform some particular act of mortification. We must repeat the same resolution several times, until we find that we have got rid of the defect or acquired the virtue. Afterwards reduce to practice the resolutions you have made as soon as an occasion shall be presented. You would also do well, before the conclusion of your prayer, to renew the vows made at your profession. The renovation is most pleasing to God, because by her vows a religious gives herself entirely to God. According to the doctrine of St. Thomas, a religious is absolved from all her sins on the day of profession, on account of the donation which she makes of herself entirely to God by means of the vows by which she consecrates to him all that she has—her property, her body, and her will. The same favour seems to be obtained by the nun who, with a true spirit of self-spoilation, renews her religious vows. Hence, I advise you to renew them frequently, as well in the common prayer as at communion; in the visit to the blessed sacrament, at rising in the morning, and in going to bed at night.

12. The conclusion of meditation consists, first, in thanking God for the lights received. Secondly, in making a purpose to fulfil the resolutions made. Thirdly, in asking of the eternal Father, for the sake of Jesus and Mary, grace to be faithful to them. And be careful never to omit at the end of meditation to recommend to God the souls in purgatory and poor sinners. St. John Chrysostom says, that nothing more clearly shows the love of a soul for Jesus Christ than her zeal in recommending her brethren to him. "Nihil declarat, quis sit amans Christi, quam si fratrum curam agat"—Hom. 3. St. Francis de Sales remarks, that in leaving mental prayer the soul should bring with her a nosegay of flowers, in order to smell them during the day; that is, she should remember one or two points in which she felt particular devotion, in order to excite her fervour during the day. The ejaculations which are dearest to God are those of love, of resignation, of oblation of ourselves. Let us endeavour not to perform any action without first offering it to God, and not to allow at the most a quarter of an hour to pass, in whatever occupations we may find ourselves, without raising the heart to the Lord by some good act. Moreover, in our leisure time, such as when we are waiting for a person, or when we walk in the garden, or are confined to bed by sickness, let us endeavour to the best of our ability to unite ourselves with God. It is also necessary, by observing silence, by seeking solitude as much as possible, and by remembering the presence of God, to preserve the pious sentiments conceived in meditation. But I shall speak more at length on this subject in the following chapter.

13. Lastly, I here add, that in order to be a soul of prayer a religious must resist with fortitude all temptations to discontinue mental prayer in the time of aridity. St. Teresa has left us very excellent instructions on this point. In one place she says: "The devil knows that he has lost the soul that perseveringly practices mental prayer." In another place she says: "I hold for certain that the Lord will conduct to the haven of salvation the soul that perseveres in mental prayer, in spite of all the sins which the devil may oppose." Again she says: "He who does not stop in the way of mental prayer reaches the end of his journey, though he should delay a little." Finally, she concludes saying: "By aridity and temptations the Lord proves his lovers. Though aridity should last for life, let not the soul give up prayer: the time will come when all shall be well rewarded." The angelic doctor says, that true devotion consists not in feeling, but in the desire and resolution to embrace promptly all that God wills. Such was the prayer which Jesus Christ made in the garden: it was all full of aridity and tediousness, but it was the most devout and meritorious prayer that had been ever offered in this world; it consisted in these words: "Not what I will, but what thou wilt"—Mark xiv. 36. Blessed sister, never give up mental prayer in the time of aridity. Should the tediousness which assails you be very great, divide your meditations into several parts, and employ yourself, for the most part, in petitions to God, even though you should seem to pray without confidence and without fruit. It will be sufficient to say and repeat: "My Jesus, mercy. Lord, have mercy on me." Pray, and doubt not but God will hear you and grant your petitions. And in going to meditation never propose to yourself your own pleasure and satisfaction, but only to please God, and to learn what he wishes you to do. And, for this purpose, pray always that God may make known to you his will, and that he may give you strength to fulfil it. All that we ought to seek in mental prayer is light to know and strength to accomplish the will of God in our regard.

PRAYER.

Ah! my Jesus, it appears that thou couldst do nothing more in order to gain the love of men. It is enough to know that thou hast wished to become man; that is, to become like us, a worm. Thou hast wished to lead a painful life of thirty-three years amid sorrow and ignominies, and in the end to die on an infamous gibbet. Thou hast also wished to remain under the appearance of bread in order to become the food of our souls; and how is it possible that Thou hast received so much ingratitude even from Christians who believe these truths, and still love thee so little? Unhappy me! I have hitherto been among those ungrateful souls; I have attended only to my pleasures, and have been forgetful of thee and thy love. I now know the evil I have done; but I repent of it with my whole heart: my Jesus, pardon me. I now love thee; I love thee so ardently that I choose death, and a thousand deaths, rather than cease to love thee. I thank thee for the light which thou givest me. Give me strength, O God of my soul, always to advance in thy love. Accept this poor heart to love thee. It is true that it has once despised thee, but now it is enamoured of thy goodness; it loves thee and desires only to love thee. O Mary, mother of God, assist me: in thy intercession I place great confidence.

CHAPTER XVI.

On silence, solitude, and the presence of God.

A DEVOUT author says: "Parum orat qui tantum orat, dum genuflectit." The religious prays little who prays only when she is on her knees in the choir or in the cell. To fulfil the obligations of her state, a religious should keep her soul continually united with God; but to maintain this constant union prayer is necessary. There are three means of acquiring the habit of continual prayer: viz., silence, solitude, and the presence of God. These were the means which the Angel suggested to St. Arsenius when he said:

"Si vis salvus esse, fuge, tace, et quiesce." If you wish to be saved fly into solitude; observe silence, and repose in God by always keeping yourself in his presence. We shall speak of each of these means separately.

SECTION I.

On Silence.

1. In the first place, silence is a great means of acquiring the spirit of prayer, and of disposing the soul to converse continually with God. We rarely find a spiritual soul that speaks much. All souls of prayer are lovers of silence, which is called the guardian of innocence, the shield against temptations, and the fountain of prayer. For by silence devotion is preserved, and in silence good thoughts spring up in the soul. "Silentium," says St. Bernard, "et a strepitu quies cogit cœlestia meditari"—Ep. 73. Silence and the absence of noise in a certain manner force the soul to think of God and of eternal goods. Hence the saints fled to the mountains, to caves, and deserts, in order to find this silence, and escape the tumults of the world, in which, as was said to Elias, God is not found. "Non in commotione Dominus"—3 Reg. xix. 11. Theodosius the monk observed silence for thirty-five years. St. John the Silent (who gave up his bishopric and became a monk) observed silence for forty-seven years before his death; and all the saints, even they who were not solitaries, have been lovers of silence.

2. Oh! how great the blessings which silence brings to the soul! The prophet says: "Erit cultus justitiæ silentium"—Isa. xxxii. 17. Silence shall cultivate justice in the soul; for, on the one hand, it saves us from a multitude of sins by destroying the root of disputes, of detractions, resentments, and curiosity; and on the other it makes it acquire many virtues. How well does the nun practice humility, who, when others speak, listens with modesty and in silence? How well does she practice mortification by not yielding to her inclination or desire to tell a certain anecdote, or to use a witty expression suggested by the conversation? How well does she practice meekness by remaining silent when unjustly censured or offended? Hence, the same holy prophet said: "In silence and in hope shall be your strength"—Ps. xxx. 15. Your strength shall be in silence and in hope; for by silence we shun the occasions of sin, and by hope we obtain the divine aid to lead a holy life.

3. But, on the other hand, immense evils flow from speaking too much. In the first place, as devotion is preserved by silence, so it is lost by a multitude of words. However recollected the soul may have been in prayer, if she afterwards indulge in long discourses, she will find the mind as distracted and dissipated as if she had not made meditation. When the mouth of the burning furnace is opened, the heat soon evaporates. "Cave a multiloquio," says St. Dorotheus, "hoc enim sanctas cogitationes extinguit"—Serm. 20. Beware of too much speaking, for it banishes from the soul holy thoughts and recollection with God. Speaking of religious who cannot abstain from inquiring after worldly news, St. Joseph Calasanctius said: "the curious religious shows that he has forgotten himself." It is certain that he who speaks too much with men, converses but little with God; for the Lord says: "I will lead her into the wilderness; and I will speak to her heart"—Osee ii. 14. If, then, the soul wishes that God speak to her heart, she must seek after solitude; but this solitude shall never be found by religious who do not love silence. "If," said the venerable Margaret of the Cross, "we remain silent, we shall find solitude." And how will the Lord ever condescend to speak to the religious, who, by seeking after the conversation of creatures, shows that the conversation of God is not sufficient to make her happy?

4. Besides, the Holy Ghost tells us that in speaking too much we shall not fail to commit some fault. "In the multitude of words there shall not want sin"—Prov. x. 19. While they speak and prolong conversation without necessity certain persons think that they are not guilty of any defect; but if they carefully examine themselves they will find some fault either against modesty, or of detraction, or of curiosity, or at least of superfluous words. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say that a religious should speak only through necessity. For religious are bound in a special manner to give an account of idle words, for which, according to our Saviour, all men shall have to account. "But I say unto you, that every idle word that men shall speak they shall account for it in the day of judgment"—Matt. xii. 36. I said some defect; but when we speak too much we shall find that we have commited a thousand faults. St. James has called the tongue a universal evil: "The tongue is . . . . . a world of iniquity"—iii. 6. For, as a learned author remarks, the greater number of sins arise from speaking or from listening to others. Alas! how many nuns shall we see condemned on the day of judgment on account of having had but little regard for silence? And what is most to be deplored is, that the religious who dissipates her mind by intercourse with creatures, and by too much speaking, shall not be able ever to see her defects, and thus she shall go from bad to worse. "A man full of tongue shall not be established in the earth"—Ps. cxxxix. 12. The man who speaks too much shall walk without a guide, and therefore he shall fall into a thousand mistakes without the hope of ever perceiving them. Such a religious appears as if unable to live without speaking continually from morning till evening. She wishes to know what happens in the monastery and in the world; she goes about asking questions from all the others, and afterwards says, what evil am I doing? I answer you, dearly beloved sister, put an end to idle talk; endeavour to recollect yourself a little, and you shall see how many defects you have committed by the multitude of your words.

5. St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say, "that a dissipated religious is a source of joy to the devil." And justly, for by her dissipation she not only does not attend to her own sanctification, but is also an obstacle to the advancement of others, by going about the monastery in search of some one to converse with her, by speaking in a loud voice in every place, and by a want of reverence even in the choir and sacristy. St. Ambrose relates that a certain priest while at prayer was disturbed by the cries of a multitude of frogs; he commanded them to be silent, and they instantly obeyed. The holy doctor then took occasion to say: "Silebunt igitur paludes, homines silebunt?"—L. 3 de Virg. Shall senseless animals, then, be silent through respect for prayer, and shall men not be silent? And I add, will religious refuse to practice silence after having entered the monastery in order to become saints, to observe their rule, and to maintain their holy recollection; or will they perform the office of the devil, by disturbing their sisters who wish to pray and to be recollected with God? A certain author justly calls such talkative nuns the familiar devils of monasteries, who do great injury to the community.

6. According to St. Ignatius of Loyola, to know if there is fervour in a convent, it is enough to ascertain whether silence is observed or violated. A monastery in which the sisters speak continually is a figure of hell, for where there is not silence there must be continual disputes, detractions, complaints, particular friendships, and faction. But, on the other hand, a monastery in which the religious love silence is the image of paradise; it excites devotion not only in all who live in it, but also in those who live in the world. It is related of Father Perez, of the order of Discalced Carmelites, that while a secular he entered one day into a house of the order, and was so edified and filled with devotion by the silence of the brethren, that he renounced the world and remained in the convent. Father Natalis, of the Society of Jesus, used to say that to reform a religious house it is enough to establish in it the observance of silence. Because each of the religious would then practice recollection, and would attend to his own advancement. Hence, also, Gerson says, that the holy founders of religious orders have prescribed and earnestly recommended silence to their religious, because they knew how important its observance is for the maintenance of fervour. In his rules for nuns, St. Basil insists, not once, but frequently, on silence. St. Benedict commanded his monks to endeavour to observe continual silence. "Omni tempore, debent silentio studere monachi"—Cap. xlii.

7. And experience shows that in the monastery in which silence is observed discipline is maintained; and on the other hand, where silence is neglected, but little fervour is found. Hence, few religious become saints, because few love silence. In many monasteries the rule of silence is prescribed by the written rules, and is strongly recommended; but some of the religious appear not to know what silence is, and therefore they unhappily live in dissipation, without fervour, and always in trouble. But, blessed sister, do not imagine that the negligence of others will excuse or exempt you from the rule of silence. Blessed Clare of Montefalco used to say, that in the time of silence it is difficult to speak without committing a fault. Some one may excuse herself, saying, that it is sometimes necessary to speak in order to get rid of melancholy; but how can the violation of silence free a religious from melancholy? Let us be persuaded that all the creatures on earth or in heaven cannot console us in our affliction. God alone is the author of consolation; but will he console us at the very time we offend him? But when there is any necessity for speaking in the time of silence, at least procure permission. Another religious does not seek occasions to speak, but as often as they are presented she allows herself to be brought into breaches of silence by others who wish to speak. But her condescension will certainly not excuse her from the fault. It is necessary, then, to do violence to yourself, and to go away, or to remain silent, and sometimes to make a sign, by putting the finger on the mouth, that it is a time of silence.

8. And even out of the hours of silence endeavour to practice it as much as possible, if you wish to keep yourself recollected with God and free from imperfections, for there is no sin more easily committed than the sins of the tongue.

"He," says Solomon, "that keepeth his tongue keepeth his soul"—Prov. xiii. 3. And St. James says that he who sins not with the tongue is a perfect man: "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man"—Jas. iii. 2. Hence, it is the same thing to be a silent religious and a holy religious: for, by observing silence, she will be punctual to the rules, she will be devoted to prayer, to spiritual reading, and to her visits to the holy sacrament. Oh! how dear to God does the religious render herself who loves silence! especially if by her silence on certain extraordinary occasions she offers to God an act of mortification; for example, when she feels greatly annoyed by long solitude, or when any very adverse or prosperous event occurs, which she feels strongly impelled to relate to others. On the other hand, the religious who indulges in much speaking will be generally dissipated, will easily omit her meditations and other devout exercises, and thus shall gradually lose all relish for God. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say: "The religious that has not a love for silence cannot find pleasure in the things of God." Hence, the unhappy soul shall abandon herself to worldly amusements, and thus she shall retain nothing but the name and habit of a religious.

9. However, it is necessary to remark that in monasteries the virtue of silence consists not in being always silent, but in observing silence when there is no necessity for speaking. Hence, Solomon says, that there is a time to keep silence and a time to speak: "Tempus tacendi et tempus loquendi"—Eccl. iii. 7. But St. Gregory of Nyssa remarks, that the time for silence is put before the time for speaking, because (as the saints adds) by silence we learn to speak well. "Per silentium discitur, quod postea proferatur." By silence we learn to consider well what we shall afterwards say. But, for a religious who wishes to become a saint, what is the time for silence and a time for speaking? The hours of silence for her are all the hours in which there is no necessity for speaking. The time for speaking is when necessity or charity obliges her to speak. Behold the excellent rule of St. Chrysostom: "Tunc solum loquendum est, quando loqui plus proficit quam silentium." Then only should we speak, when it is more useful to speak than to be silent. Hence, the saint gives the following advice: "Aut tace aut die meliora silentio." Either remain silent, or say what is more profitable than silence. Oh! happy he who at death can say what the monk Pambo said: "That he did not remember to have uttered a word which he was sorry for having spoken"—Rodriguez, part 2, tract. 2, chap. 8 St.

Arsenius used to say, that he often repented of having spoken, but never of having remained silent. "Me sæpe pœnituit dixisse, nunquam tacuisse." St. Ephrem gave this excellent lesson to religious: "Cum Deo multis, cum hominibus paucis loquere." Speak a great deal with God, and little with men. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say the same: "The true servant of Jesus Christ bears all things; she labours much and speaks little."

10. From all that has been said every religious who wishes to live in union with God may see with what care she should shun the parlour. As the air which is breathed in the choir or in the cell is the most salubrious for religious, so the air of the grates is for them the most pestiferous. And what is the parlour but what St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi called it, a place of distractions, inquietudes, and of temptations. The venerable sister Mary Villani one day compelled the devil, on the part of God, to tell in what part of the monastery he gained most. The tempter answered: I gain in the choir, in the refectory, and in the dormitory: in these places I partly gain, and partly lose. But in the parlour I gain all, for the whole place is mine. Hence the venerable sister Philippa Caverina had reason to call the parlour an infected place, in which the contagion of sin is easily caught. St. Bernardine of Sienna relates that a religious, in consequence of having heard in the parlour an improper word, miserably fell into a grievous sin. Truly happy was the holy virgin St. Fabronia (who afterwards gave her life for the faith at the age of nineteen): she would never allow herself to be seen at the grate by any secular, male or female. St. Teresa appeared after death to one of her spritual children, and said to her: The religious who wishes to be a great friend of God must be an enemy of the grate. Would to God, that in all monasteries there were grates of punched iron, such as we find in some observant convents. A certain author relates that the superioress of a monastery procured a close grate: but the devil, through rage, first bent it and afterwards sent it rolling through the house. The good superioress placed it, crooked as it was, in the parlour, to give the nuns to understand that as the grate was hateful to hell so it was pleasing to God. Oh! what an awful account shall the abbess have to give to God, who introduces open grates, or who neglects to make the companions attend. In one of her letters St. Teresa wrote this great sentence (p. 1, let. 26): The grates when shut are the gates of heaven; and when open they are the gates of danger (she did not wish to say hell.) And she added: a monastery of nuns, in which there is liberty, serves to conduct them to hell rather than to cure their weakness.

11. Oh! what rapid progress in divine love does the religious make who resolves never to go to the grate! When you, O blessed sister, go to the parlour, be careful at least to conduct yourself like a religious. In your intercourse with seculars you should not only guard with great care against all affectionate expressions, but should also be very grave and reserved in the parlour. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi wished her nuns to be as uncultivated as the wild deer—these are her very words. And the venerable sister Hyacinth Marescotti used to say: The courtesy of nuns consists in being discourteous, by cutting short all long discourses in the parlour. This applies, ordinarily speaking, to long discourses, even with spiritual persons. Mother Anne of the Jesus, a Discalced Carmelite, said: A nun acquires more fervour in the choir or in the cell than by the longest conferences in the parlour. Show all respect to directors, but you should treat with them only through necessity; dispatch your business with them in a few words. Should you ever happen to hear in the parlour an indecent word, fly away: or at least cast down your eyes and change the discourse, or give no answer. In a monastery of the venerable sister Seraphina da Carpi, two females began to speak about a certain marriage: the attendant at the turn heard the voice of sister Seraphina (who was dead) saying, chase away, chase away these women. And whenever it is in your power, endeavour to change all discourses which savour of the world. St. Frances of Rome received a buffet from an angel because she did not change the conversation of certain ladies who spoke of worldly vanities. You should be still more careful to observe silence with your sisters in the monastery: for the occasion of breaking silence with them is more continual. Hence, it is necessary to mortify curiosity. The abbot John used to say: let him who wishes to restrain the tongue shut his ears by mortifying the curiosity of hearing news. It is also necessary to avoid the conversation of any religious who speaks frequently. It is, moreover, well to fix some time each day during which you will observe silence, remaining alone in your cell or in some solitary place, in order to avoid the occasion of speaking.

12. Whenever you have to speak be careful, in conformity with the advice of the Holy Ghost, "Make a balance for thy words"—Eccl. xxxviii. 22, to examine what you ought to say. Make a balance for your words, that you may weigh them before you give expression to them.

Hence, St. Bernard said: "Bis ad limam veniant verba quam semel ad linguam"—In 8, punct. perf. Before your words come to the tongue let them pass twice under the file of examination, that you may suppress what you should not utter. The same was said by St. Francis de Sales in other words, viz., that to speak without defects every one should keep a lock upon his lips, that in opening his mouth to speak he might reflect on what he wishes to say. When you have to speak, examine first whether what you intend to say can injure charity, modesty, or exact observance. Secondly, examine the motive which impels you to speak; for it sometimes happens that what a person says is good, but her intention is bad; she speaks either to appear spiritual or acquire a character for talent. Thirdly, examine to whom you speak, whether to your superiors, to companions, or to inferiors: whether in the presence of seculars or of the postulants, who may, perhaps, be scandalized at what you say. Fourthly, examine the time at which you speak, whether at the time of silence or of repose. Fifthly, the place in which you speak, whether in the choir, in the sacristy, or the corridors, at the door or in the parlour. Sixthly, be careful to speak with simplicity, avoiding all affection: with humility, abstaining from all words of pride or vain-glory: with sweetness, never uttering a word that savours of impatience or that tends to the discredit of a neighbour: with moderation, by not being the first to give your opinion on any question which may be proposed, particularly if you are younger than the others: with modesty, by not interrupting any sister while she is speaking; and also by abstaining from every word which savours of the world, from all indecent gestures and immoderate laughter, and by speaking in a low tone of voice: for St. Bonaventure says that it is a great defect in a religious to speak in a loud voice, particularly at night. And should you, as superior, be ever obliged to correct a sister, take care not to reprimand her in a loud voice: for otherwise she will perceive that you speak through impatience, and then the reprimand will be unprofitable.

13. At recreation, which is the proper time for unbending the mind, speak when others are silent, but endeavour as often as you can to speak on something connected with God. "Loquamur Dominum Jesum," says St. Ambrose, "ipsum semper loquamur"—In Ps. xxxi. Let us speak of the Lord Jesus, and let us always speak of him. And what other enjoyment should a religious seek than to speak of her most amiable spouse? He who has an ardent love for another appears unable to speak of anything but him. They who speak little of Jesus Christ show that they have but little love for Jesus Christ. On the other hand, it often happens that a good religious, after speaking on divine love, feels more fervour than after mental prayer. At the conversations of the servants of God, says St. Teresa, Jesus Christ is always present. Of this Father Gisolfo, of the Congregation of the Pii Operarii, relates a memorable example in the life of the venerable Father Anthony de Collelis—Cap. 31. Father D. Constantine Rossi, the master of novices, saw, one day, two of his young disciples (F. D. Anthony Torres, and F. D. Philip Orilia) conversing together, and with them a young man of most beautiful aspect. The master of novices was surprised that the two novices whom he considered to be most exemplary would speak to a stranger without permission: he therefore asked who was the young man whom he had seen conversing with them. They said there was no one conversing with them. But he afterwards learned that they were speaking of Jesus Christ, and understood that the person whom he saw in their company was our Divine Saviour.

14. Except in the hour of recreation, and other extraordinary occasions, such as in attending the sick or in consoling a sister in tribulation, it is always better to be silent. A religious of the order of St. Teresa, as we find in the Teresian Chronicles, said that "it is better to speak with God than to speak of God." But when obedience or charity obliges you to speak, or to have intercourse with creatures, you must always endeavour to find intervals for at least repairing the losses caused by the distractions attendant on these external occupations; stealing at least as many little moments as possible to recollect yourself with God; thus following the counsel of the Holy Ghost: "Let not the part of a good gift overpass thee"—Eccl. xvi. 14. Do not allow that particle of time to pass away: give it to God, if you can have no more to give him during the day. But whenever you can abridge the conversation abridge it under some pretext. A good religious seeks not pretexts (as some do) to prolong conversation, but endeavours to find some means of shortening it. Let us remember that time is given us not to be spent unprofitably, but to be employed for God, and in acquiring merits for eternity. St. Bernardine of Sienna used to say that a moment of time is of as much value as God, because in each moment we can gain his friendship or greater degrees of grace.

PRAYER.

O my God, may the patience with which thou hast borne me be for ever blessed. Thou hast given me time to love thee, and I have spent it in offending and displeasing thee. Were I now to die, with what heartfelt pain should I end my life at the thought of having spent so many years in the world and of having done nothing. Lord, I thank thee for still giving me time to repair my negligence and so many lost years. O my Jesus, through the merits of thy passion assist me. I do not wish to live any longer for myself, but only for thee and for thy love. I know not how much of life remains, whether it is long or short; but were it a hundred or a thousand years, I wish to spend them all in loving and pleasing thee. I love thee, O my Sovereign Good, and I hope to love thee for eternity. I do not wish to be ever ungrateful to thee. I will no longer resist thy love, which has so long called me to be entirely thine. Will I wait till thou abandon me and call me no more? Mary, my mother, assist me, pray for me, and obtain for me perseverance in my resolution to be faithful to God. Amen.

SECTION II.

On the love of solitude, and on avoiding idleness.

1. Whosoever loves God loves solitude—there the Lord communicates himself more familiarly to souls, because there he finds them less entangled in worldly affairs and more detached from earthly affections. Hence, St. Jerome exclaimed: "O solitude, in which God speaks and converses familiarly with his servants!" O blessed solitude, in which God speaks and converses with his beloved spouses with familiarity, with great love and confidence! God speaks not at the grates, nor in the belvedere, nor in any other place in which religious indulge in useless laughter and idle talk. "Non in commotione Dominus." The Lord is not in the earthquake. But where is he? "I will lead her into the wilderness, and I will speak to her heart"—Osee ii. 14. He speaks in solitude, and there he speaks to the heart in words which inflame it with his holy love, as the sacred spouse attests: "my soul melted when my beloved spoke"—Cant. 5, 6. St. Eucherius relates (Ep. ad. S. Hil.) that a certain man, desirous of becoming a saint, asked a servant of God where he should find God? The servant of God conducted him to a solitary place and said: behold where God is found. By these words he meant to say that God is found not amid the tumults of the world, but in solitude.

2. Virtue is easily preserved in solitude; and, on the other hand it is easily lost by intercourse with the world, where God is but little known, and therefore his love, and the goods which he gives to those who leave all things for his sake, are but little esteemed. St. Bernard says that he learned more among the trees of the forest than from books and masters. Hence, the saints, in order to live in solitude, and far from tumult, have so ardently loved the caves, the mountains, and the woods. "The land that was desolate and impassable shall be glad, and the wilderness shall rejoice, and shall flourish like the lily; it shall bud forth and blossom . . . . . They shall see the glory of the Lord and the beauty of our God"—Isaias xxxv. 1, 2. The wilderness shall be a perennial fountain of joy and gladness to the souls that seek it: it shall flourish like the lily in whitness and innocence of life, and shall produce fruits of every virtue. These happy souls shall, in the end, be raised on high to see the glory and infinite beauty of the Lord. It is certain that to keep the heart united with God, we must preserve in the soul the thoughts of God, and of the immense goods which he prepares for those who love him; but when we hold intercourse with the world, it presents to us earthly things, which cancel spiritual impressions and pious sentiments. Hence, for a nun who delights in receiving visits and letters, in reading the newspaper, and in speaking frequently of the things of the world, it is impossible to be a good religious. Every time that she unnecessarily holds intercourse with seculars she shall suffer a diminution of fervour.

3. There is no one more deserving of pity than a nun who, being unable to go into the world, brings the world to herself by spending a great part of the day in vain amusements, in conversing with seculars at the grate, or in diverting herself with the sisters, laughing, talking, censuring others, and by seeking to learn what happens in the neighbourhood. Shall a spouse of Jesus Christ, who should have no other pleasure than that of conversing with her God, place her consolation in a life of distraction and of intercourse with seculars, who, by their conversation, will infect her heart with the corrupt maxims of the world? Shall she thus spend the time which the Lord gives her in order to become a saint? O God! how can she squander that time whose moments the saints would have purchased even at the cost of their blood? Alas! when she shall one day find herself at the hour of death, what would she give for a day, or even for one of the many hours which she now loses! A certain religious said at the end of her life: O hat I had more time, I would give it all to God! But the unhappy soul desired time, when for her time was no more.

4. Besides, I say to you, blessed sister, God in his goodness has rescued you from the dangers of the world, and has given you the courage to forsake it: why, then should you expose yourself to the same dangers by again holding intercourse with the world? "Evasimus semel," says Tertullian, "hactenus pericolosis nos non inferamus." We have escaped once from the waves of the world (in which so many perish,) let us not voluntarily cast ourselves again into the midst of them, and expose our souls to the danger of perdition. The religious who wishes to become a Saint should seek neither to know nor be known by the world; she should endeavour, to the utmost of her ability, neither to see nor be seen by seculars. Blessed Clare of Montefalco spoke even to her brother with the veil drawn down; the abbess said, that in conversing with her brother she might rise the veil. She answered: my mother, since I speak only with the tongue, allow me to remain covered. The words of the venerable Frances Farnese are also very remarkable. My sisters, said she, we are shut up within these walls not to see and to be seen, but to hide ourselves from creatures. The more we hide ourselves from them the more Jesus Christ will unveil himself to us.

5. Worldlings shun solitude, and with good reason; for in solitude they feel more acutely the remorses of conscience, and therefore they go in search of the conversations and tumults of the world, that the noise of these occupations may stifle the stings of remorse. The religious, then, who flies from solitude shows that she, too, is a disorderly soul, who, in order to extinguish the remorses caused by her irregularities, seeks after the noise and bustle of the world. On the other hand, religious who live with a tranquil conscience cannot but love solitude; and when they find themselves out of it they feel like a fish out of water—they enjoy no peace, and are as it were in a violent state. It is true that man loves society; but what society preferable to the society of God? Ah! to withdraw from creatures, and to converse in solitude with our Creator, brings neither bitterness nor tediousness. Of this the wise man assures us: "Non enim habet amaritudinem conversatio illius, nec tædium convictus illius, sed lætitiam, et gaudium"—Sap. viii. 16. The venerable Father Vincent Caraffa, General of the Society of Jesus (as has been said in another place,) said that he desired nothing in this world, and that were he to desire anything he would wish only for a little grotto, along with a morsel of bread and a spiritual book, in order to live there always in solitude.

6. It is not true that a life of solitude is a life of melancholy; it is a foretaste and beginning of the life of the Saints in bliss, who are filled with an immense joy in the sole occupation of loving and praising their God. Thus, St. Jerome said, that flying from Rome he went to shut himself up in the cave of Bethlehem, in order to enjoy solitude. Hence, he afterwards wrote: "To me solitude is a paradise"—Ep. 4, ad Rustic. The Saints in solitude appear to be alone, but they are not alone. St. Bernard said: "Nunquam minus solus, quam cum solus"—Ep. ad Fratr. de Monte, etc. He meant to say: I am never less alone than when I find myself alone: for I am then in the company of my Lord, who gives me more content than I could derive from the conversation of all creatures. They appear to be in sadness, but they are not sad: the world seeing them far away from earthly amusements regard them as miserable and disconsolate: but they are not so; they, as the Apostle attests, enjoy an immense and continual peace. "As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing"—2 Cor. vi. 10. The prophet Isaias attested the same when he said: "The Lord therefore will comfort Sion, and will comfort all the ruins thereof; and he will make her desert as a place of pleasure, and her wilderness as the garden of the Lord. Joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving and the voice of praise"—Isaias li. 3. The Lord well knows how to console the solitary soul, and will give a thousandfold compensation for all the temporal pleasures which she has forfeited: He will render her solitude a garden of his delights. There joy and gladness shall be always found, and nothing shall be heard but the voice of thanksgiving and praise to the divine goodness. Hence, Cardinal Petrucci describes the happiness of a solitary heart in the following words: "It appears to be sad, and it is filled with celestial joy. Though it treads on the earth, its dwelling is in heaven. It asks nothing for itself, because in its bosom it contains an immense treasure. It appears to be agitated and overwhelmed by the tempest, and it is always in a secure harbour."

7. In order to find this happy solitude, it is not necessary for you, O blessed sister, to hide yourself in a cave or in a desert; even in the monastery you can, whenever you wish, find the solitude which you desire. Shun the grates—shun useless conversations and discourses; love the choir and the cell; remain in the choir or cell whenever obedience or charity does not call you elsewhere; and thus you shall find the solitude which is suited to you, and which God wishes from you. Thus David found it, even in the midst of the great concerns of a kingdom, and therefore he said: "Lo, I have gone far off flying away, and I abode in the wilderness"—Ps. liv. 8. St. Philip Neri desired to retire into a desert, but God gave him to understand that he should not leave Rome, but that he should live there as in a desert. The Lord wishes the same from religious whom he desires to be his true spouses; he wishes them to be enclosed in gardens that in them he may be able to find his delights. "My sister—my spouse is a garden enclosed" —Cant. iv. 12. But Gilbert well remarks: "Hortus esse mescit qui non vult esse conclusus." The nun who is unwilling to be enclosed, that is careful to bring into her heart the thoughts and dangers of the world, by frequent intercourse with worldlings, cannot be the garden of Jesus Christ.

8. "Sede ergo solitarius," says St. Bernard, "secede, non corpore, sed intentione." Even when you are with the sisters at work, or at the common recreation, endeavour not to leave your solitude; be careful to keep yourself as much as possible recollected with God; and if you cannot withdraw in body from conversation, withdraw, at least, in affection and intention, by intending to remain there only because it is God's will that you should remain. Since you must sometimes have intercourse with creatures, you ought to act like a tender female, who, being accustomed to remain always in a close chamber, far from the society of men, endeavours, when obliged to go into the street, to return as quickly as possible in order to escape the cold and bustle. It is thus that holy religious act when, by duty or charity, they are forced to converse with the sisters or with externs: they suffer a species of martyrdom, partly on account of their repugnance to hold intercourse with creatures, and partly through fear of committing some fault, and therefore they seek to abridge the conversation as much as possible.

9. When external occupations last for a long time it is very difficult to escape defects. Even when they were employed in the conversion of sinners, Jesus Christ wished the holy Apostles to retire, from time to time, into a solitary place, in order to give some repose to the spirit. "Come apart into a desert place, and rest a little"—Mark vi. 13. Yes, for in external occupations, even of a spiritual nature, the soul falls into distractions, disquietudes, coldness of divine love, and imperfection; hence, repose is always necessary to remove the stains contracted, and to acquire strength to walk better for the future. It is not necessary, then, to remain always in solitude; but, as St. Laurence Justinian has written, we ought to procure it whenever we can, and when we cannot we ought to love it: "Solitudo semper amanda est, tenenda vero non semper"—De connub. cap. 6. Hence, when a religious is obliged to interrupt her retirement in order to serve the community or to relieve the necessity of a sister, she must do it with liberty of soul, without disturbing herself; otherwise she will show attachment to solitude, which is a great defect. But in going to treat with creatures her object must not be to amuse herself by their conversation, but to practice obedience or charity. Then, as soon as the conversation is over, she ought instantly to retire to her beloved solitude.

10. Hitherto we have spoken of the solitude of the body; we must now say something on the solitude of the heart, which is more necessary than the solitude of the body. "Of what use," says St. Gregory, "is the solitude of the body without the solitude of the heart"—Lib. Mor. cap. 12. That is, of what use is it to live in the desert, if the heart is attached to the world? A soul detached and free from earthly affections, says St. Peter Chrysologus, finds solitude even in the public streets and highways. "In plateis, et in triviis suum pietas habet secretum"—Serm. 9. On the other hand, of what use is it to observe silence in the choir or in the cell if affections to creatures are heard in the heart, and by their noise render the soul unable to listen to the divine inspirations? I here repeat the words of our Lord to St. Teresa: Oh! how gladly would I speak to many souls; but the world makes such a noise in their heart that my voice cannot be heard. Oh! that they would retire a little from the world! Let us, then, understand what is meant by solitude of the heart. It consists in expelling from the soul every affection which is not for God, by seeking nothing in all our actions but to please his divine eyes. It consists in saying with David: "What have I in heaven? and besides thee what do I desire upon earth? . . . . Thou art the God of my heart, and the God that is my portion for ever"—Ps. lxxii. 26. O my God, except thee what is there on earth or in heaven that can content me? Thou alone art the Lord of my heart, and thou shalt always be my only treasure. In fine, solitude of the heart implies that you can say with sincerity: my God, I wish for thee alone, and for nothing else.

11. Such a religious complains that she does not find God; but listen to what St. Teresa says: Detach the heart from all things—seek God, and then you shall find him. God can neither be sought nor found if he is not first known; but how can a soul attached to creatures comprehend God and his divine beauty? The light of the sun cannot enter a crystal vessel filled with earth; and in a heart occupied with affections to pleasures, to wealth, and to honours, the divine light cannot shine. Hence the Lord says: "Be still, and see that I am God"—Ps. xlv. 11. The soul, then, that wishes to see God must remove the world from her heart and keep it shut against all earthly affections. This is precisely what Jesus Christ gave us to understand under the figure of a closed chamber, when he said: "But when thou shalt pray, enter into thy chamber, and having shut the door, pray to the Father in secret"—Matt. vi. 6. That is, the soul, in order to unite herself with God in prayer, must retire into her heart (which, according to St. Augustine, is the chamber of which our Lord speaks,) and shut the door against all earthly affections.

12. This is also the meaning of the words of Jeremiah: "Sedebit solitarius et tacebit, quia levavit se super se"—Thren. iii. 28. The solitary soul, that is the soul that is free from all attachments, and in which earthly affections are silent, will unite herself with God in mental prayer by holy desires, by oblations of herself, and by acts of love; and then she shall find herself raised above all created objects, so that she will smile at the worldling who sets so high a value on the goods of this earth, and submits to so many toils in order to secure their enjoyment, while she regards them as trifles, and utterly unworthy of the love of a heart created to love God, who is an infinite good. Hence, Cardinal Petrucci says that the love of a heart dedicated to the divine love is raised above all that is spread over the theatre of the world.

13. But remember that by solitude I do not mean pure leisure, as if a religious were to be free from all occupations and from all care. God wishes that his spouses be solitary, but not idle. Some nuns lead a hidden and retired life, but in their retreat they either remain idle, without applying themselves to any work, or spend their time in vain reading, or in other useless occupations. They remain silent, but of this useless silence St. Basil says they shall render an account to God. "Reddent rationem pro otioso silentio." Idle solitude is the solitude of beasts; solitude devoted to curious studies is worldly solitude; religious solitude is neither idle nor useless, but is all fruitful and holy. Religious should remain in their cells like the bee, which in its little cell never ceases to make honey; and hence, they should not waste their time, but should be employed either in prayer or in reading spiritual books, or in manual works, which will not hinder them to keep the mind on God. "Solitudo," says St. John Chrysostom, "non facit esse solum"—In Ps. 140. In solitude the soul is not idle, but occupied in God. In a certain convent of St. Francis there was an idle brother who was always going about the house; now troublesome to one, and again to another. The Saint called him Brother Fly. Would to God that in monasteries there were not Sisters Fly constantly going about observing who is at the grate or at confession; who sends or receives presents and the like. Such religious would deserve, like flies, to be expelled the house, or at least to be shut up in a prison, that they might cease to disturb others.

14. It is a common saying that idleness is the parent of all vices, and it is founded on the oracle of the Holy Ghost: "Idleness hath taught much evil"—Eccl. xxxiii. 29. St. Joseph Calasanctius says: "The devil goes in pursuit of idle religious." And, according to St. Bonaventure, a religious assiduously employed is molested with one temptation, but an idle religious shall be assailed by a thousand. It is certain that to a nun the cell is a great help to practice recollection with God. But the same St. Joseph said, that a religious "makes a bad use of her cell when, while in it, she neither speaks with God nor labours for God." We cannot be always at prayer, and therefore, in this life, it is necessary for religious to be employed in manual occupations. "She hath sought wool and flax, and hath wrought by the counsel of her hands"—Prov. xxxi. 13. Hence, St. Jerome prescribed to Demetriade to have wool always in her hands: "Habeto lænam semper in manibus." All holy women, particularly religious, have employed themselves in manual work. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, though infirm and weak, took her part in all the labours of the monastery, as well for the choir nun as for the lay sisters. She worked now in the kitchen and again in the refectory; at one time she swept the convent, at another she carried water from the well. She laboured so hard in making bread that she distorted one of the bones of her hand. In a word, the author of her life says that she performed more work than four lay sisters together.

15. And let it be observed that it is an error to imagine that labour is injurious to bodily health, for it is certain that manual employment contributes greatly to the preservation of health, and this is the reason why lay sisters ordinarily enjoy better health than the choir nuns. Ah! it is frequently not so much the danger of health as the desire of escaping the pain attendant on labour that makes us excuse ourselves from manual work. But the religious who looks at the crucifix will not endeavour to shun labour. Sister Frances of St. Angelo, of the Carmelite order, complained one day to Jesus on the cross, that by severity of labour she had injured her hands. Jesus answered: "Frances, look at my hands and then complain." Besides, manual work contributes greatly to relieve the tediousness of solitude, and also to overcome temptations, which are very frequent in solitude. St. Anthony found himself one day so molested with immodest thoughts, and so weary of solitude, that he knew not what to do. An angel appeared and conducted the Saint to a little garden. There he took the mattock and began to dig, and afterwards to pray; he next resumed the work, and again returned to prayer. From the conduct of the angel the Saint learned that he was to live in solitude, and at the same time defend himself against temptations by passing from prayer to work and from work to prayer. A person should not be always employed at work; but it is impossible for a religious to be always at prayer without losing her head, and rendering herself utterly unfit for all spiritual exercises. Hence, St. Teresa after death appeared to Sister Paula Mary of Jesus, and exhorted her not to fail to exercise herself in corporal works under the delusive pretext of devoting herself more to holy occupations; and the Saint added, that these manual exercises are a great help to eternal salvation.

16. Besides, manual works, when performed without solitude and passion, do not hinder us to pray. Sister Margaret of the Cross, the Infanta of Austria, a discalced nun, used to perform the most laborious offices of the monastery, and would say that labour is not only useful but necessary for nuns, since it does not hinder them to raise the heart to God. It is related that St. Bernard one day saw a monk who while he worked did not cease to pray. The Saint said to him: "My brother, continue to do always what you do at present, and be of good cheer; for by acting in this manner you shall after death be exempt even from purgatory. The saint afterwards practiced the same, as we read in his life (lib. 3, cap. 1,) "Totus exterius laborabat, et totus internus Deo vacabat." He did not neglect his external works, but he was at the same time wholly recollected in God. And thus, every religious, while she works with her hands, should not neglect to keep her heart occupied with God, otherwise all her external employments shall be without spiritual fruit, and shall be full of imperfections. Hence, the spouse of the Canticles says to the soul: "Place me as a seal upon thy heart, as a seal upon thy arm"—Cant. viii. 6. He first tells her to place him as a seal upon her heart, and afterwards upon her arm; because, if she has not God in her heart, she cannot have him upon the arm, that is, her external works cannot be pleasing to him. But, on the other hand, St. Teresa says that "works of the active life, when they spring from divine love, are the highest perfection."

17. Hence, it is an error in a religious to wish to remain always in solitude, or to shun all external occupations. But it is also an error in her to undertake voluntarily such a multiplicity of employments that she afterwards has not time to recollect herself with God. "My son, meddle not with many matters; and if thou be rich thou shalt not be free from sin"—Eccl. xi. 10. Son, says the Lord, do not burden yourself with so many concerns; for if you wish to attend to them all, you may indeed succeed, but not without sin. There are others, who, when they undertake any business, apply themselves so closely to it that they render themselves unable to think of anything else. What has been undertaken should be done with diligence, but with tranquillity and without passion, so that the soul may have liberty to turn to God from time to time. You should labour: but you who are a religious should not work like a secular, toiling night and day in order to accumulate money. And for what purpose? In order to make presents, or to gratify vanity or caprice. It is necessary to work, but to work like a religious; hence, attend first to the business of the soul, and afterwards to that of the body, employing yourself in external exercises with a pure intention either of practicing obedience, or of assisting the community, or of relieving your own pressing wants, and of avoiding idleness, but always without avidity or solicitude, which may hinder you to raise the heart to God. St. Antonine says that in every external occupation, however urgent, we must always keep a secret little corner within, in which we may take refuge, and turn to God, when we find ourselves oppressed and overwhelmed with business. Hence, it is of great importance to take care in the beginning, as well as in the progress of our work, to raise the heart several times to God by an act of love, of oblation, of resignation, or by a petition for his graces. Why, for example, can you not, when employed in embroidering, or in sewing, make at every moment an act of the love of God, or of oblation of yourself? I conclude this point. Fervent nuns in all their works are recollected in spirit, unite themselves more closely with God, and always acquire merit. But the tepid and negligent fabricate cobwebs; for they labour and toil through earthly motives, and thus lose all.

PRAYER.

My Jesus, grant that I may love thee ardently during the remainder of my life, and that I may be entirely thine. I curse the days in which I have loved creatures so as to displease thee. Henceforth I wish to love nothing but thee. I entreat thee to give me strength to detach my heart from all things which divert me from thy love. Grant that my heart may be employed in regarding thee alone as the only object worthy of my love. O Incarnate Word! thou hast come into the world to dwell in our souls, which thou hast redeemed with thy blood. Let my heart, then, be all thine. Take possession of it and watch over all my wants; illuminate my soul, inflame me, and make me promptly obey all thy wishes. My Jesus, my sovereign good, I love thee, and I esteem thee above every good. I give myself entirely to thee: accept me to serve thee for ever, but to serve thee not through fear, but through love. Thy majesty deserves to be feared, but thy goodness deserves still more to be loved. O Mary, my mother and my refuge, obtain for me the grace to belong entirely to Jesus. Amen.

SECTION III.

On the presence of God.

1. The practice of the presence of God is justly called by spiritual masters the foundation of a spiritual life, which consists in three things: the avoidance of sin, the practice of virtue, and union with God. These three effects the presence of God produces: it preserves the soul from sin, leads her to the practice of virtue, and moves her to unite herself with God by means of holy love.

2. As to the first effect, the avoidance of sin, there is no more efficacious means of subduing the passions, of resisting temptations, and consequently of avoiding sin, than the remembrance of God's presence. The angelic doctor says: 'Si Dominum præsentem cogitaremus vix aut nunquam peccaremus"—Op. 58, cap. 2. If we always thought that God was looking at us we would never, or scarcely ever, do what is displeasing in his eyes. And St. Jerome has written that the remembrance of God's presence closes the door against all sins. "The remembrance of God," says the holy doctor, "shuts out all sins"—In Ezech. iv. And if men will not dare in their presence to transgress the commands of princes, parents, or superiors, how could they ever violate the laws of God if they thought that God was looking at them? St. Ambrose relates that a page of Alexander the Great, who held in his hand a lighted torch whilst Alexander was offering sacrifice in the temple, suffered his hand to be burnt sooner than be guilty of irreverence by allowing the torch to fall. The Saint adds: Lib. 3, de Verg. "If reverence to his sovereign could conquer nature in a boy, how much more will the thought of the divine presence make a faithful soul overcome every temptation, and suffer every pain rather than insult the Lord before his face."

3. All the sins of men flow from their losing sight of the divine presence. "Every evil," says St. Teresa, "happens to us because we do not reflect that God is present with us, but imagine he is at a distance." And, before her, David said the same: "God is not before his eyes; his ways are filthy at all times"—Ps. x. 5, secund. Hebr. Sinners forget that God sees them, and therefore they offend him at all times. The Abbot Diocles went so far as to say (Ap. Pall. cap. 9,) that "he who distracts himself from the remembrance of the presence of God becomes either a beast or a devil." And justly; for he shall be instantly assailed by carnal or diabolical desires, which he will not have strength to resist.

4. On the other hand, the saints, by the thought that God was looking at them, have bravely repelled all the assaults of their enemies. This thought gave courage to holy Susanna to resist the temptations of the elders, and even to despise their threats against her life. Hence, she courageously said to them: "It is better for me to fall into your hands without doing it, than to sin in the sight of the Lord"—Sus. xiii. 23. It is better to fall into your hands and to die without sin than to offend God before his face. This thought also converted a wicked woman who dared to tempt St. Ephrem: the saint told her that if she wished to sin she must meet him in the middle of the city. But, said she, how is it possible to commit sin before so many persons? And how, replied the saint, is it possible to sin in the presence of God who sees us in every place? At these words she burst into tears, and falling prostrate on the ground asked pardon of the saint, and besought him to point out to her the way of salvation. St. Ephrem placed her in a monastery, where she led a holy life, weeping over her sins till death—Metaphrast. in vita S. Ephr. The same happened to the Abbot Paphnutius and a sinner called Thais. She tempted him one day, saying that there was no one to see them but God. The saint with a stern voice said to her: "Then you believe that God sees you, and will you commit sin?" Thais was thunderstruck, and filled with horror for her sinful life, she gathered together all her riches, clothes, and jewels, which she had earned by her infamous practices, burned them in the public square, and retired into a monastery, where she fasted on bread and water every day for three successive years, always repeating this prayer: O thou who hast made me, have mercy on me. My God, who hast created me, have pity on me. After these three years she happily ended her life by a holy death. It was afterwards revealed to Paul, a disciple of St. Anthony, that this happy penitent was placed among the saints on an exalted throne of glory—Sabel. lib. 5, exampl. cap. 2.

5. Behold the efficacy of the remembrance of the divine presence to make us avoid sins. Let us then always pray to the Lord, saying with Job: "Set me beside thee, and let any man's hand fight against me"—Job xvii. 3. My God, place me in thy presence; that is, remind me in every place that thou seest me, and then let all my enemies assail me; I shall always defeat them. Hence St. Chrysostom concludes: "Si ita nos ipsos disposuerimus, nihil mali cogitabimus, nihil mali dicemus, nihil mali faciemus"—Hom. 7, ad Phil. 3. If we keep ourselves always in the presence of God, the thought that he sees all our thoughts, that he hears all our words, and observes all our actions, will preserve us from thinking any evil, from speaking any evil, and from doing any evil.

6. As to the second effect, the practice of virtue, the presence of God is also a great means. Oh! what valour does a soldier exhibit in the presence of his sovereign. The sole thought that his prince, by whom he shall be punished or rewarded, is present, inspires him with great courage and strength. Thus, also, when such a religious is in the presence of her superior, with what exterior recollection does she pray; with what modesty and humility does she treat the sisters; with what care does she execute the directions which she receives. Hence, if they reflected that God was looking at all their actions, all religious would do all things well, with a pure intention, without seeking to please any one but God, and without any regard to human respect. St. Basil says that were a person to find himself in the presence of a king and a peasant, his sole concern would be to please the king, without any regard to the wishes of the peasant. Thus he who walks in the divine presence is regardless of the pleasure of creatures, and seeks only to please God, who sees him always.

7. As to the third effect of the divine presence, that is, to unite the soul with God, it is an infallible rule that love is increased by the presence of the object loved. This happens even among men, although the more they converse together the more their defects are discovered. How much more shall the love of a soul for God increase if she keep him before her eyes, for the more she converses with him the better she comprehends his beauty and amiableness? The morning and evening meditation are not sufficient to keep the soul united with God. St. Chrysostom says, that even water, if removed from the fire, soon returns to its natural temperature; and, therefore, after prayer it is necessary to preserve fervour by the presence of God, and by renewing our affections. St. Bernard says of himself, that in the beginning of his conversion, when he found himself disturbed, or his fervour cooled, peace and the ardour of divine love were instantly restored by the remembrance of a deceased or absent saint. "Ad solam defuncti seu absentis memoriam stabat spiritus." Now, how much greater the effect which must be produced upon a soul that loves God, by remembering that he is present, and that he is asking her love? David said that by the remembrance of his God he was filled with joy and consolation. "I remembered God, and was delighted"—Ps. lxxvi. 4. However great the affliction and desolation of a soul may be, if she loves God she shall be consoled and freed from her affliction by remembering her beloved Lord. Hence, souls enamoured of God live always with a tranquil heart and in continual peace; because, like the sunflower, which always turns its face to the sun, they, in all events, and in all their actions, seek always to live and act in the presence of God. "A true lover," says St. Teresa, "always remembers her beloved."

8. Let us now come to the practice of this excellent exercise of the divine presence. This exercise consists partly in the operation of the understanding and partly in the operation of the will; of the understanding, in beholding God present; of the will, in uniting the soul with God by acts of humiliation, of adoration, of love, and the like; of the latter we shall speak more particularly hereafter. First, with regard to the intellect, the presence of God may be practiced in four ways. First, by imagining that our Redeemer, Jesus Christ, is present, that he is in our company, and that he sees us in whatsoever place we may be. We can at one time represent him in one mystery, and again in another; for example, now an infant lying in the manger of Bethlehem; and again a pilgrim flying into Egypt; now a boy working in the shop of Nazareth, and again suffering as a criminal in his passion in Jerusalem, scourged, or crowned with thorns, or nailed to a cross. St. Teresa praises this method of practicing the presence of God. But it is necessary to remark that though this method is good, it is not the best, nor is it always profitable; first, because it is not conformable to truth, for Jesus Christ, as God and man together, is present with us only after communion, or when we are before the Blessed Sacrament. Besides, this mode is liable to illusion, or may, at least, injure the head by the efforts of imagination. Hence, should you wish to practice it, you must do it sweetly, only when you find it useful, and without labouring to represent in the mind the peculiar features of our Saviour, his countenance, his stature, or colour. It is enough to represent him in a confused manner, as if he were observing all we do.

9. The second method, which is more secure and more excellent, is founded on the truth of faith, and consists in beholding with eyes of faith God present with us in every place, in considering that he encompasses us, that he sees and observes whatever we do. We indeed do not see him with the eyes of the flesh. Neither do we see the air, and we know for certain that it surrounds us on every side, that we live in it, for without it we could neither breathe nor live. We do not see God, but our holy faith teaches that he is always present with us. "Do not I fill heaven and earth, saith the Lord?"—Jer. xxiii. 24. Is it not true, says God, that I fill heaven and earth by my presence? And as a sponge in the midst of the ocean is encompassed and saturated with water, so (says the apostle) we live in God, we move in God, and have our being in God. "In ipso vivimus movemur et sumus"—Acts xvi. 18. And our God, says St. Augustine, observes every action, every word, every thought of each of us, as if he forgot all his other creatures, and had to attend to us alone. Hence, observing all we do, say, and think, he marks and registers all, in order to demand an account on the day of accounts, and to give us then the reward or the chastisement we will have deserved. This second mode of practicing the divine presence does not fatigue the mind; for the exercise of it we need only enliven our faith with an affectionate act of the will, saying: My God, I believe firmly that you are here present. To this act we can easily add the acts of love, or of resignation, or of purity of intention, and the like.

10. The third means of preserving the remembrance of the presence of God is to recognise him in his creatures, which have from him their being, and their power of serving us. God is in the water to wash us, in the fire to warm us, in the sun to enlighten us, in food to nourish us, in clothes to cover us; and in like manner in all other things which he has created for our use. When we see a beautiful object, a beautiful garden, or a beautiful flower, let us think that there we behold a ray of the infinite beauty of God, who has given existence to that object. If we converse with a man of sanctity and learning, let us consider that it is God who imparts to him a small portion of his own holiness and wisdom. Thus, also, when we hear harmonious sounds, when we feel a fragrant odor, or taste delicious meat or drink, let us remember that God is the being who by his presence imparts to us these delights, that by them we may be induced to aspire to the eternal delights of Paradise.

11. Let us accustom ourselves to behold in every object God, who presents himself to us in every creature; and let us offer him acts of thanksgiving and of love, remembering that from eternity he has thought of creating so many beautiful creatures that we might love him. "Disce amare," says St. Augustine, "in factura Factorem, ne teneat te, quod ab illo factum est, et amittas eum a quo et ipse factus es"—In Ps. 19. Learn, he says, to love your Creator in creatures; and fix not your affections on what God has made, lest you should become attached to creatures and lose him by whom you, too, have been created. This was the practice of the Saint. At the sight of creatures he was accustomed to raise his heart to God; hence, he exclaimed with love: Heaven and earth and all things tell me to love you. When he beheld the heavens, the stars, the fields, the mountains, he seemed to hear them say: Augustine, love God; for he has created us for no other end than that you might love him. Thus likewise, St. Teresa, when she beheld the plains, the sea, the rivers, or other beautiful creatures, she felt as if they reproached her with ingratitude to God. Thus also, St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, holding in her hand a flower or an apple, and looking at it, became enraptured with divine love, saying within herself: Then, my God has thought from eternity of creating this fruit for my sake, and to give me a proof of the love which he bears me! It is also related of St. Simon Salo, that when in walking through the fields he saw flowers or herbs he would strike with his staff, saying: Be silent! be silent! you reproach me with not loving that God who has made you so beautiful for my sake, that I might be induced to love him: I have already heard you; cease, reprove me no longer, be silent.

12. The fourth and most perfect means of remembering the divine presence is to consider God within us. We need not ascend to heaven to find our God; let us be recollected within ourselves and in ourselves we shall find him. To treat in prayer with God, as at a distance, causes great distraction. St. Teresa used to say: I never knew how to make mental prayer as it ought to be made, till God taught me this manner of praying; in this recollection within myself I have always found great profit. To come to what is practical, it is necessary to know that God is present in us in a manner different from that in which he is present in other creatures; in us he is present as in his own temple and his own house. "Know ye not," says the Apostle, "that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?"—1 Cor. iii. 17. Hence, our Saviour says that into a soul that loves God he comes with the Father and Holy Ghost, not to remain there for a short time, but to dwell in it for ever, and there to establish an everlasting habitation. "If any one love me, ... my Father will love him, and we will come to him, and will make our abode with him"—John xiv. 23.

13. The kings of the earth, though they have their great palaces, have, notwithstanding, their particular apartments in which they generally live. God is in all places; his presence fills heaven and earth; but he dwells in a particular manner in our souls, and there, as he himself tells us by the mouth of the Apostle, he delights to remain as in so many gardens of pleasure. "I will dwell in them, and will walk among them, and I will be their God"—2 Cor. vi. 16. There he wishes us to love him and to pray to him: for he remains in us full of love and mercy, to hear our supplications, to receive our affections, to enlighten us, to govern us, to bestow on us his gifts, and to assist us in all that can contribute to our eternal salvation. Let us then often endeavour, on the one hand, to enliven our faith in this great truth, and annihilate ourselves at the sight of the great majesty that condescends to dwell within us: and on the other, let us be careful to make acts at one time of confidence, at another of oblation, and again of love of his infinite goodness; now thanking him for his favours, at another time rejoicing in his glory; and again, asking counsel in our doubts. Consoling ourselves always in the possession of this Sovereign Good within us, certain that no created power can deprive us of him, and that he will never depart from us unless we first voluntarily banish him from our hearts.

14. This was the little cell which St. Catherine of Sienna built within her heart, in which she lived always retired, always engaged in loving colloquies with God: thus she defended herself against the persecution of her parents, who had forbidden her to retire any more to the chamber for the purpose of praying. And in this little cell the Saint made greater progress than she did by retiring to her room: for she was obliged to leave her chamber several times in the day: this interior cell she never left, but remained in it always recollected with God. Hence, St. Teresa, speaking of the divine presence in our interior, said: I believe that they who are able to lock themselves up in this little heaven in their souls, where he who created them is always present, walk in an excellent path, because they make great progress in a short time. In a word, by this exercise of the presence of God the saints have succeeded in acquiring great treasures of merits. "I set the Lord always in my sight," says the Royal Prophet, "for he is at my right hand that I be not moved"—Ps. xv. 8. I endeavour to consider God always present and observing all my actions. Blessed Henry Suson applied himself with so much attention to this holy exercise that he performed all his actions in the divine presence; and thus continually conversed with God by tender affections. St. Gertrude acquired the habit of this exercise so perfectly that our Lord said of her to St. Mathilda: "This beloved spouse always walks in my presence, seeking always to do my will, and directing all her works to my glory"—Lib. 1, S. Gertr. cap. 11. This was also the practice of St. Teresa: in whatever occupation she found herself she never lost sight of her beloved Lord.

15. If, then, you ask me how often in the day you should remember the presence of God, I will answer you with St. Bernard, that you ought to remember it every moment. As there is not a moment (says the Saint,) in which we do not enjoy the benefits of God, so there is not a moment in which we should not remember God, and prove our gratitude. If you knew that the king was always thinking of you and of your welfare, though he should confer no real benefit, still you could not remember his affection without feeling an interior love for him. It is certain that your God is always thinking of you, and that he incessantly confers favours on you, at one time by his lights, at another by internal helps, and again by loving visits: is it not ingratitude in you to be forgetful of him for any length of time? It is, then, a duty, to endeavour to remember always, or at least as often as we can, the divine presence.

This was the advice of the Lord to Abraham: "Walk before me, and be perfect"—Gen. xvii. 1. Endeavour to walk always in my presence, and you shall be perfect. Tobias gave the same advice to his son: "All the days of thy life have God in thy mind"—Tob. iv. 6. My son, during your whole life keep God always before your eyes. The exercise of the divine presence St. Dorotheus recommended in a most special manner to his disciple St. Dositheus, who besought him to tell him what he should do in order to be a saint: "Cogita semper Deum tibi præsentem." Consider that God is always present, and that he is looking at you. St. Dorotheus relates that the good disciple was so faithful to the advice, that in all his occupations, and even in the severe infirmities with which he was visited, he never lost sight of God. Thus, after being a soldier, and a dissolute young man, he attained in five years so high a degree of sanctity, that after death he was seen in heaven seated on a throne of glory, equal to that of the most holy among the anchorets.

16. The great servant of God, Father Joseph Anchieta (who, by the exercise of the divine presence, arrived at such perfection,) said, that nothing else but our inattention to it can divert us from so holy an exercise. The prophet Micheas says: "I will show thee, O man, what is good, and what the Lord requireth of thee . . . . . to walk solicitous with thy God"—Mich. vi. 8. O man, I will show you in what your welfare consists, and what the Lord demands of you—behold it: he wishes you to be solicitous, and that your whole concern be to do all your actions in his presence; because then all shall be well done. Hence, St. Gregory has written: "We ought not to draw breath, as often as we should remember God"—Orat. de cura paup. We ought says the saint, to remember God as often as we breathe; and he adds, by doing this we shall do all things. Another devout author says that meditation may in some cases be omitted; for example, in the time of sickness, or of important business which cannot be deferred; but the exercise of the presence of God must be always practiced by acts of purity of intention, of oblation, and the like, as shall be more fully explained hereafter.

17. Hitherto we have spoken of the operation of the intellect; allow me to speak of the application of the will to the holy exercise of the divine presence. And it is necessary first to know that to remain always before God, with the mind always fixed on him, is the happy lot of the saints; but in the present state it is morally impossible to keep up the presence of God without interruption. Hence we should endeavour to practice it to the best of our ability, not with a solicitous inquietude and indiscreet effort of the mind, but with sweetness and tranquillity. There are three means of facilitating the application of the will to this exercise; the first method consists in frequently raising the heart to God by short but fervent ejaculations, or loving affections towards God, present with us. These may be practiced in all places, and in all times, in walking, at work, at meals, and at recreation. These affections may be acts of election, of desire, of resignation, of oblation, of love, of renunciation, of thanksgiving, of petition, of humiliation, of confidence, and the like. In whatever occupation you find yourself, you can very easily turn to God from time to time, and say to him: My God, I wish for thee alone, and nothing else. I desire nothing but to be all thine. Dispose as thou pleasest of me and of all I possess. I give myself entirely to thee. I love thee more than myself. I wish only what thou wishest. I renounce all things for the love of thee. I thank thee for the great graces thou hast bestowed upon me. Assist me, have mercy on me. Give me thy holy love. Lord, I should be at this moment in hell. I delight in thy felicity. I would wish that all men loved thee. Do not permit me to be separated from thee. In thee I place all my confidence. When shall I see thee and love thee face to face? Let all that I do and suffer be done and suffered for thee. May thy holy will be always done. The ancient fathers set great value on all these short prayers, by which we can practice the presence of God more easily than by long prayers. And St. John Chrysostom used to say that he who makes use of these short prayers or acts shuts the door against the devil, and prevents him from coming next us with bad thoughts. "Si crebris precationibus te ipsum accendas, non dabis occasionem Diabolo, et ullum ad suas cogitationes aditum"—Hom. 4, de Fide.

18. At certain special times it is necessary more particularly to enliven our faith in the divine presence. First, in the morning when we awake, by saying: My God, I believe that you are here present, and that you shall be present with me in every place to which I shall go this day; watch over me, then, in all places, and do not permit me to offend you before your divine eyes. Secondly, at the commencement of all our prayers, whether mental or vocal. The venerable Cardinal D. Innico Carraccioli used to say, that he who makes mental prayer with distractions shows that he has been negligent in making the act of faith of the presence of God. Thirdly, on occasion of any temptation against patience or chastity; for example, if you are seized with any sharp pain, or receive any grievous insult, or if any scandalous object be presented to you, instantly arm yourself with the divine presence, and excite your courage by remembering that God is looking at you. It was thus that David prepared himself to resist temptations. "My eyes are ever towards the Lord; for he shall pluck my feet out of the snare"—Ps. xxiv. 15. I will keep my eyes on my God, and he will deliver me from the snares of my enemies. You must do the same when you have occasion to perform any very difficult act of virtue; you must imitate the valorous Judith, who, after having unsheathed the sword, and taking Holofernes, who was asleep, by the hair of the head, turned to God before she gave the stroke, and said: "Strengthen me, O Lord, in this hour"—Judith xiii. 9. Thus she courageously cut off his head.

19. The second method of preserving the presence of God by acts of the will, is to renew always, in distracting employments, the intention of performing them all with the intention of pleasing God. And, therefore, in the beginning of every action or occupation, whether you apply yourself to work, go to table, to recreation, or to repose, say: Lord, I do not intend in this work my pleasure, but only the accomplishment of your will. In the course of the action, endeavour to renew your intention, saying: My God, may all be for your glory. By these acts the presence of God is preserved without fatiguing the mind; for the very desire of pleasing God is a loving remembrance of his presence. It is also useful to fix certain times, or particular signs, in order to remember the divine presence; as when the clock strikes, when you look at the crucifix, when you enter or leave the cell. Some are accustomed to keep in their room some particular sign to remind them of the presence of God.

20. The third method is, when you find yourself very much distracted during the day, and the mind oppressed with business, to procure leave from the superior to retire, at least for a little, to the choir or to the cell in order to recollect yourself with God. Were you on any day to feel bodily weakness arising from excess of labour and long fasting, would you not take some refreshment in order to be able to proceed with the work? How much more careful should you be to treat the soul in a similar manner when it begins to fail in courage, and to grow cold in divine love, in consequence of being a long time without food; that is without prayer and recollection with God? I again repeat what Father Balthassar Alvarez used to say, that a soul out of prayer is like a fish out of water; she is, as it were, in a state of violence. Hence, after being a long time engaged in business and distracting occupations, a Christian should retire (if I may use the expression) to take breath in solitude, recollecting himself there with God by affections and petitions. The life of bliss in heaven consists in seeing and loving God, and therefore I infer that the felicity of a soul on this earth consists also in loving and seeing God, not openly as in paradise, but with the eyes of faith, by which she beholds him always present with her; and thus acquires great reverence, confidence, and love towards her beloved Lord. He who lives in this manner begins, even in this valley of tears, to live like the saints in heaven, who always see God. They "always see the face of my Father"—Matt. xviii. 10, and therefore they cannot cease to love him. Thus he who lives in the divine presence will despise all earthly things, knowing that before God all is misery and smoke, and will begin in this life to possess that Sovereign Good, which contents the heart more than all other goods.

PRAYER.

My adored Jesus, thou hast not refused to give all thy blood for me; and shall I refuse to give thee all my love? No, my beloved Redeemer, I offer myself entirely to thee; accept me, and dispose of me as thou pleasest. But since thou givest me the desire of thy pure love, teach me what I ought to do, and I will do it. Grant that this heart, which was once miserably deprived of thy love, may now neither love nor seek anything but thee. Grant that my will may wish only what thou wishest. Unhappy me! I once, for the sake of my pleasures, despised thy will, and forgot thee. Grant that from this day forward I may forget all things, even myself, to think only of loving and pleasing thee. O my God, amiable above every good, how bitterly do I regret that hitherto I have had so little regard for thee. Lord, pardon me, draw me entirely to thyself; do not permit me to love thee but little, or to love anything but thee. I hope for all things from thy goodness and from thy merits, O my Jesus. And I place all confidence in thee, O my queen, my advocate, and my mother, Mary. Have pity on me, and recommend me to thy Son, who hears thy prayers, and refuses thee nothing. Amen.

CHAPTER XVII.

On Spiritual Reading.

1. To a spiritual life the reading of holy books is perhaps not less useful than mental prayer. St. Bernard says, reading instructs us at once in prayer and in the practice of virtue. "Lectio nos ad orationem instruit, et ad operationem"—Serm. 50, de modo beno viv. Hence, he concluded that spiritual reading and prayer are the arms by which hell is conquered and paradise won. "Lectio et oratio sunt arma, quibus Diabolus expugnatur, Beatitudo acquiritur"—Ibid. We cannot always have access to a spiritual father for counsel in our actions, and particularly in our doubts; but reading will abundantly supply his place, by giving us lights and directions to escape the illusions of the devil and of our own self-love, and at the same time to submit to the divine will. Hence, St. Athanasius used to say, that we find no one devoted to the service of the Lord who did not practice spiritual reading. "Sine legendi studio neminem ad Deum intentum videas." Hence, all the founders of religious orders have strongly recommended this holy exercise to their religious. St. Benedict, among the rest, commanded that each monk should every day make a spiritual lecture, and that two others should be appointed to go about visiting the cells, to see if all fulfilled the command: and should any monk be found negligent in the observance of the rule, the saint ordered a penance to be imposed upon him. But before all, the apostle prescribed spiritual reading to Timothy. "Attend unto reading"—1 Tim. iv. 13. Mark the word attend, which signifies, that although Timothy, as being bishop, was greatly occupied with the care of his flock, still the apostle wished him to apply to the reading of holy books, not in a passing way and for a short time, but regularly, and for a considerable time.

2. The lecture of spiritual works is as profitable as the reading of bad books is noxious. As the former has led to the conversion of many sinners, so the latter is every day the ruin of many young persons. The first author of Pious books is the spirit of God; but the author of pernicious writings is the devil, who often artfully conceals from certain persons the poison which such works contain, and makes these persons believe that the reading of such books is necessary in order to speak well, and acquire a knowledge of the world for their own direction, or at least in order to pass the time agreeably. But I say that, especially for nuns, nothing is more pernicious than the reading of bad books. And by bad books I mean not only those which are condemned by the Holy See, either because they contain heresy, or treat of subjects opposed to chastity, but also all books which treat of worldly love. What fervour can a religious have if she reads romances, comedies, or profane poetry? What recollection can she have in meditation or at communion? Can she be called the spouse of Jesus Christ? Should she not rather be called the spouse of a sinful world? Even young females in the world, who are in the habit of reading such books, are generally not virtuous seculars.

3. But some one may say, what harm is there in reading romances and profane poetry, when they contain nothing immodest? Do you ask what harm? Behold the harm: the reading of such works kindles the concupiscence of the senses and awakens the passions; these easily gain the consent of the will, or at least render it so weak that when the occasion of any dangerous affection occurs, the devil finds the soul already prepared to rush into the precipice. A wise author has said, that by the reading of such pernicious books heresy has made, and makes every day, great progress; because such reading has given, and gives, increased strength to libertinism. The poison of these books enters gradually into the soul; it first makes itself master of the understanding, then infects the will, and in the end kills the soul. The devil finds no means more efficacious and secure of sending a young person to perdition than the reading of such poisoned works. Oh! what desolation shall this poison produce should it ever be introduced into any religious community! A single bad book will be sufficient to cause the destruction of a monastery. Blessed spouse of the Lord, should a work of this description ever fall into your hands, cast it at once into the fire, that it may never more be seen. And if you are superior, and wish not to have a great account to render to God, exclude all such books from the convent.

4. Remember also that for you certain useless books, though not bad, will be pernicious, because they will make you lose the time which you can employ in occupations profitable to the soul. In a letter to his disciple Eustochium, St. Jerome stated, for her instruction, that in his solitude at Bethlehem he was attached to, and frequently read, the works of Cicero, and that he felt a certain disgust for pious books because their style was not polished. He was seized with a serious malady, in which he saw himself at the tribunal of Jesus Christ. The Lord said to him: "Tell me what are you?" "I am," replied the saint, "a Christian."

"No," rejoined the judge, "you are a Ciceronian, not a Christian." He then commanded him to be instantly scourged. The saint promised to correct his fault, and having returned from the vision he found his shoulders livid and covered with wounds, in consequence of the chastisement he had received. Thenceforward he gave up the works of Cicero, and devoted himself to the reading of books of piety. It is true that in the works like those of Cicero we sometimes find useful sentiments; but the same St. Jerome wisely said in a letter to another disciple: "Non necesse habes aurum in luto quærere"—Ep. ad Furian. What need have you of seeking for a little gold in the midst of so much mire, when you can read pious books in which you shall find all gold without any mire? Works on moral theology also are ordinarily useless, and sometimes even injurious to a nun, because by reading them her conscience may be disturbed, or she may learn what it is not useful for her to know. To some the reading of books on mystic theology may be pernicious, for it may incline them to seek after supernatural prayer, and to abandon the ordinary method of mental prayer by considerations and affections; thus they may be left without one or the other. For no one should seek to attain to the prayer of contemplation unless God clearly calls him to it. Hence, St. Teresa after death appeared to one of her nuns, and directed that the superiors should forbid the religious to read her books of visions and revelations, saying that she had become a saint not by visions and revelations but by the practice of virtue.

5. But let us return to the subject. Oh! how great the blessings which the reading of spiritual books brings to the soul! In the first place, as the reading of bad books fills the mind with worldly and poisonous sentiments, so, on the other hand, the reading of pious works fills the soul with holy thoughts and good desires. How can the religious be recollected and filled with holy thoughts who spends a considerable part of the day in reading curious and profane works, which bring into her head a thousand worldly ideas and a crowd of earthly affections? How can she keep herself in the divine presence and offer to God frequent acts of love, of oblation, of petition, and the like? The mill grinds the corn which it receives: if the wheat be bad how can the mill make good flour? The nun who has employed a considerable time in reading curious books will go to meditation and communion, and then, instead of thinking of God, and of making acts of love and confidence, she will be constantly molested with distractions; for the representations of all the vanities she has read will be presented to her mind. On the other hand, the nun who keeps the mind filled with devout thoughts, such as spiritual maxims, examples of the virtuous actions of the saints, will, not only during prayers, but also at other times, be accompanied by these thoughts, and by them she will be kept almost always united with God. St. Bernard explains this by a beautiful similitude in his exposition of the words, "seek and you shall find"—John xvi. 24. He says: "Quærite legendo, et invenietis meditando; lectio quasi cibum ori apponit, meditatio masticat"—St. Bern. Scala Cla. Seek, by reading books of devotion, and in meditation you shall find what you seek; for reading puts into the mouth the food which is afterwards masticated by meditation.

6. In the second place, the soul that is imbued with holy thoughts in reading is always prepared to banish internal temptations. The advice which St. Jerome gave to his disciple Salvina was: "Semper in manibus tuis sit divina lectio, ut cogitationum sagittæ hujusmodi clypeo repellantur"—Ep. ad Sal. Endeavour to have always in your hand a pious book, that with this shield you may defend yourself against bad thoughts. In the third place, spiritual reading serves to make us see the stains which infect the soul, and helps us to remove them. The same St. Jerome recommended Demetriade to avail herself of spiritual reading as of a mirror: "Lectionem adhibens speculi vice"—Ep. ad Dem. He meant to say that as a mirror exhibits the stains of the countenance, so holy books show us the defects of the soul. "Ibi," says St. Gregory, speaking of spiritual reading, "fœda, ibi pulchra nostra cognoscimus; ibi sentimus quantum proficimus"—Mor. lib. 2, cap. 1. There we perceive the losses we have sustained, and the advantages we have acquired; there we observe our falling back, or our progress in the way of God. In the fourth place, in reading holy books we receive many lights and divine calls. St. Jerome says that when we pray we speak to God, but when we read God speaks to us: "Oras, loqueris ad sponsum; legis, ille tibi loquitur"—Ep. 22. St. Ambrose says the same: "We address him when we pray: we hear him when we read"—Lib. de off. cap. 20. In prayer God hears our petitions, but in reading we listen to his voice. We cannot, as I have already said, always have at hand a spiritual father, nor can we hear the sermons of sacred orators, to direct and give us light to walk well in the way of God: good books supply the place of sermons. St. Augustine writes that good books are, as it were, so many letters of love which the Lord sends us; in which he warns us of our dangers, teaches us the way of salvation, animates us to suffer adversity, enlightens us, and inflames us with divine love. Whoever, then, desires to be saved, and to acquire divine love, should often read these letters of paradise.

7. How many saints have, by reading a spiritual book, been induced to forsake the world and to give themselves to God? It is known to all that St. Augustine, when miserably chained by his passions and vices, was, by reading one of the epistles of St. Paul, enlightened with divine light, went forth from his darkness, and began to lead a life of holiness. Thus also, St. Ignatius, while a soldier, by reading a volume of the lives of the saints, which he accidentally took up, in order to get rid of the tediousness of the bed to which he was confined by sickness, was led to commence a life of sanctity, and became the father and founder of the Society of Jesus—an order which has done so much for the Church. Thus by reading a pious book, accidentally, and almost against his will, St. John Colombino left the world, became a saint, and the founder of another religious order. St. Augustine relates (Conf. lib. 8, cap. 6,) that two courtiers of the Emperor Theodosius entered one day into a monastery of solitaries; one of them began to read the life of St. Anthony, which he found in one of the cells: so strong was the impression made upon him that he resolved to take leave of the world. He then addressed his companion with so much fervour that both of them remained in the monastery to serve God. We read in the Chronicles of the Discalced Carmelites, that a lady of Vienna was prepared to go to a festivity, but because it was given up she fell into a violent passion. To divert her attention she began to read a spiritual book which was at hand, and conceived such a contempt for the world that she abandoned it, and became a Teresian nun. The same happened to the Duchess of Montalto, in Sicily. She began also by accident to read the works of St. Teresa, and afterwards continued to read them with so much fervour that she sought and obtained her husband's consent to become a religious, and entered among the Discalced Carmelites.

8. But the reading of spiritual books has not only contributed to the conversion of saints, but has also given them during their whole life great aid to persevere and to advance continually in perfection. The glorious St. Dominick used to embrace his spiritual books, and press them to his bosom, saying, these give me milk. And how, except by meditation and the use of pious books, were the anchorets enabled to spend so many years in the desert, at a distance from all human society? This great servant of God, Thomas a Kempis, could not enjoy greater consolation than in remaining in a corner of his cell with a spiritual book in his hand. It has been already mentioned in this work that the venerable Vincent Caraffa used to say that he could not desire a greater happiness in this world than to live in a little grotto, provided with a morsel of bread and a spiritual book. St. Philip Neri devoted all the vacant hours which he could procure to the reading of spiritual books, and particularly the lives of the saints.

9. If you ask me what book is most useful for religious, first I tell you to read the books which you find best calculated to excite your devotion, and to move you most powerfully to unite your soul with God. Of this character are the works of St. Francis de Sales, St. Teresa, Father Granada, Rodriguez, Sanguire, Nieremberg, Pinamonti, and other similar books; and particularly the Admonitions to Religious, by the Fathers of St. Maur, and the Ascetic Directory of Father Scaramelli, a modern work, but full of learning and unction. In general I advise you to lay aside works that are hard to be understood, and to read books of devotion written in a plain and simple style. Be careful also to read the subjects which you know will contribute most to your perfection. Among the rest, read frequently the lives of the saints, and particularly of those who have been religious; such as the life of St. Teresa, of St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, of St. Catherine of Sienna, of St. Jane Chantal, of the venerable Frances Farnese, of the venerable Sister Seraphina da Capri, of St. Peter of Alcantara, of St. John of the Cross, of St. Francis Borgia, of St. Aloysius Gonzaga, etc. Read frequently the lives of the martyrs, particularly of so many virgins who have given their lives for Jesus Christ. You can use the lives of the saints published by Father Croisset. Oh! how profitable is such reading! In books of instruction we read what we are bound to do, but in the lives of the saints we read what many holy men and women, who were flesh as we are, have done. Hence, their example, if it produces no other fruit, will at least humble us. In reading the great things which the saints have done we shall certainly be ashamed of the little we have done and still do for God.

10. St. Augustine said of himself: "Exempla servorum tuorum congesta in sinum cogitationis nostræ urebant et absumebant torporem nostrum et accendebant nos"—Conf. cap. 1. My God, the examples of thy servants, when I meditated on them, consumed my tepidity and inflamed me with thy holy love. Of St. Francis, St. Bonaventure writes: "Ex recordatione Sanctorum tanquam lapidum ignitorum, in Deificum recalescebat incendium"—Vit. c. 9. By the remembrance of the saints and of their virtues, as if they were so many stones of fire, he was inflamed with new love for God. St. Gregory also relates, (hom. 15) that in Rome there was a beggar called Servolus; he was afflicted with infirmities, and lived on alms; he gave part to the poor, and employed the remainder in purchasing pious books. Servolus could not read, but he got those whom he lodged in his little house to read for him. St. Gregory says that by listening to these spiritual lectures Servolus acquired great patience and a wonderful knowledge of the things of God. Finally, the saint states that at death he besought his friends to read for him; but before breathing his last he interrupted the reading, and said: "Be silent, do you not hear how paradise resounds with harmonious music?" After these words he sweetly expired. Immediately after his death a most agreeable odor was diffused over the room, in testimony of the sanctity of the beggar, who died poor in earthly goods, but rich in virtue and merits.

11. But to draw great fruit from spiritual reading, it is, in the first place, necessary to recommend yourself beforehand to God, that he may enlighten the mind while you read. It has been already said that in spiritual reading the Lord condescends to speak to us; and, therefore, in taking up the book we must pray to God in the words of Samuel: "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." Speak, O my Lord, for I wish to obey thee in all that thou wilt make known to me to be thy will. In the second place, you must read, not in order to acquire learning, nor to indulge curiosity, but for the sole purpose of advancing in divine love. To read for the sake of knowledge is not spiritual reading, but is, at the time of spiritual lecture, a study unprofitable to the soul. It is still worse to read through curiosity, as certain nuns do, who devour books, seeking only to finish them in a short time, and to gratify curiosity. What profit do they expect to draw from such reading? All the time devoted to such lectures is lost time. "Multi leguni," says St. Gregory, "et a lectione jejuni sunt"—Hom. 10 in Ezech. Many read, and read a great deal, but, because they have read only through curiosity, they have got up from reading as hungry as if they had made no lecture. Hence, the saint corrected a physician called Theodore, for reading spiritual books quickly and without profit.

12. To derive advantage from pious books it is necessary to read them slowly and with attention. "Nourish your soul," says St. Augustine, "with divine lectures"—Lib. de Op. mon. Now, to receive nutriment from food, it must not be devoured but well masticated. Remember, then, in the third place, that to reap abundant fruit from pious reading you must masticate and ponder well what you read; applying to yourself what is there inculcated. And when what you have read has made a lively impression on you, St. Ephrem counsels you to read it a second time: "Non pigeat sæpius eundem repetere sensum." Besides, when you receive any special light in reading, or any instruction which penetrates the heart, it will be very useful to stop, and to raise the mind to God by making a good resolution, or a good act, or a fervent prayer. "Oratio," says St. Bernard, "lectionem interrumpat"—Serm. ad Frat., etc. It is useful, then, to interrupt the lecture and to offer a prayer, and to continue to pray as long as the lively impression lasts. Let us imitate the bees, that pass not from one flower to another until they have gathered all the honey which they found in the first. This we should do, although all the time prescribed for the lecture should be spent in such acts; for thus the time is spent with greater spiritual profit. Sometimes it may happen that you draw more fruit from reading a single verse than from reading an entire page. Moreover, at the end of the lecture you must select some sentiment of devotion, excited by what you have read, and carry it with you as you would carry a flower from a garden of pleasure.

PRAYER.

My Lord, I thank thee for so many helps and lights which thou gavest me, in order to make me a Saint, and to unite me always more closely with thee. When will the day arrive on which I shall see myself freed from all earthly affections, and entirely united to thy heart, which is so enamoured of my soul! I hope for all things from thy infinite mercy. My Jesus, I cannot bear to see myself any longer ungrateful to thy love, as I have hitherto been. "Create a clean heart in me, O God." Lord, give me a new heart, which will think only of pleasing thee. This desire, which thou givest me, makes me hope for thy grace. My God, I believe in thee, and for thy faith I would give my life a thousand times. I hope in thee, through the merits of Jesus Christ; without them I should be lost. O Sovereign Good, I love thee; and for the love of thee I renounce all things, and embrace every pain and every cross which thou wishest to send me. I have offended thee, but I feel more sorrow for having offended thee than if I had suffered every other misfortune. I now sigh only for thy grace and love. My God, assist me, have mercy on me. Holy Virgin, assist me by thy prayers, which obtain from God whatever thou asketh. My mother, recommend me to thy Son; do not forget me. Amen.

CHAPTER XVIII.

ON THE FREQUENTATION OF THE SACRAMENTS OF PENANCE AND THE EUCHARIST.

SECTION I.

On Confession.

1. I DO not intend to treat in this place of the confessions of those who commit mortal sins (although I shall say something on proximate occasions and on sacrilegious confessions,) but I will principally speak of the confessions of timorous souls who love perfection, and endeavour constantly to purify their souls more and more from the stain of venial sins. Cesarius relates (lib. 2, cap. 38,) that a good priest commanded, in the name of God, a devil who appeared to him to tell what was most hurtful to him. The demon answered that nothing was more injurious or displeasing to him than frequent confessions. Jesus Christ once said to St. Bridget, that they who wish to preserve fervour should often purify their souls by accusing themselves in confession of all their defects, and all their negligence in his service.—Apud. Blos. Mon. Spir. cap. 5. Cassian says (Collat. 1, cap. 5) that he who aspires to perfection shall aim at great purity of conscience; because from purity of conscience the soul passes to perfect love. Hence, love corresponds to cleanness of heart. It is however necessary to know that in the present state this purity does not consist in a total exemption from all faults; for except our divine Saviour and his divine Mother, there neither has been nor shall be in this world any soul free from stain. "In many things we all offend"—James iii. 2. But it consists in two things: first, in a careful guard over the heart, to prevent the commission of deliberate sin, however venial; and secondly, in instantly purifying the soul from any fault which she may commit.

2. Now these two are precisely the fruits of frequent confession, which, in the first place cleanses the soul from any stains which she contracts. St. John Climacus relates (Scala gradu. 4,) that a young man, in order to discontinue the wicked life which he led in the world, went to a monastery in order to become a religious. Before his admission, the abbot told him if he wished to be received he must make a public confession. The young man, who was sincerely resolved to give himself to God, readily obeyed; and behold, while he confessed his faults in presence of the monks, a holy religious among them saw a man of venerable aspect expunge from a written paper which he held in his hand every sin which had been confessed, so that at the end of the confession all the sins of the penitent were cancelled. Now, what then took place in a visible manner happens invisibly to every one who confesses his sins with the requisite dispositions.

3. Confession not only washes away the stains of the soul, but it also gives her strength against relapse. The angelic doctor teaches (3, p. q. 85, a. 2,) that the virtue of penance not only destroys the fault which has been committed, but also prevents it from budding forth again. In his life of St. Malachy, St. Bernard relates that there was a certain woman who was so much given to impatience and to anger that she became insupportable. Malachy induced her to make a confession of all her sins of anger. St. Bernard states that after her confession she became so meek and patient that she appeared incapable of resenting any injury or insult. Hence, to acquire purity of conscience many saints confessed their sins every day. Such was the practice of St. Catherine of Sienna, of St. Bridget, of Blessed Coletta, of Charles Borromeo, of St. Ignatius of Loyola, and of many others. St. Francis Borgia went to confession even twice a day. If worldlings cannot bear to appear before those whom they love with a stain on the countenance, what wonder that souls that love God should endeavour to purify themselves more and more, in order to render themselves more pleasing in the eyes of their Lord. But I do not require religious who practice frequent communion to confess every time they communicate; but it is right that they should go to confession twice, or at least once a week, and also when they have committed any deliberate fault.

4. Every one knows that for a good confession three things are necessary: an examination of conscience, sorrow, and a purpose to avoid sin. First, as to the examination of conscience, for those who frequent the sacraments it is not necessary to distress the head by efforts to find out all the minute circumstances of venial sins. I would rather see such persons careful to discover the causes and roots of their attachments and tepidity. I say this for certain nuns who go to confession with their head full of things heard at the grate, and thus they always tell the same tale, and recite the same faults without sorrow, and without any thought of amendment. For spiritual souls who go frequently to confession, and guard against deliberate venial sins, it is not necessary to spend a long time in the examination of conscience: with regard to grevious sins, they need not scrutinize the conscience: for had they committed any mortal sin they would know it without examination. With regard to venial sins, had they been fully deliberate, they, too, by their punctures, should make themselves known to the soul; besides there is no obligation of confessing all our venial transgressions, consequently we are not obliged to make a strict search after them; and much less after the number, the circumstance, the manner, or the cause of them: it is enough to confess those that are most grievous, and most opposed to perfection, and to tell the rest in general terms. And when you have not certain matter for the sacrament tell some sin of your past life for which you have greater sorrow; and say, for example: I accuse myself in a special manner of all the faults I have committed in my past life, against charity, purity, or obedience. How consoling is the doctrine of St. Francis de Sales on this point. "Be not troubled (he says) if you do not remember all your little faults at confession: for as you often fall imperceptibly so you are often raised up imperceptibly," that is, by the acts of love, or by the other good acts which devout souls are accustomed to perform.

5. In the second place, sorrow is necessary; this is the principal condition necessary for obtaining the pardon of sins. The most sorrowful, not the longest confessions, are the best. The proof of a confession is found not in the multitude of the words of the penitent but in the compunction which he exhibits. But let nuns who go frequently to confession, and abhor even venial faults, banish all doubts regarding the sincerity of their sorrow. Some are troubled because they do not feel sorrow: they wish to shed tears, and to feel a tender sorrow every time they receive the sacrament of penance; and because, with all their efforts, they are unable to excite this tender sorrow, they feel always uneasy about their confessions. But you must be persuaded that true sorrow consists not in feeling it but in wishing for it. All the merit of virtue is in the will: hence, speaking of the virtue of faith, Gerson has said that sometimes a person who wishes to believe has more merit than another who believes: "Aliquando non tam meritorium est credere, quam velle credere"—De præp. ad Miss.

Cons. 3. Speaking of sorrow, St. Thomas says: "In contritione est duplex dolor, unus in ipsa voluntate, qui essentialiter ipsa contritio quæ nihil aliud est, quam displicentia peccati præteriti: alius dolor est in parte sensitiva, qui causatur ex ipso dolore"—Sup. 3, p. q. 3, a. 1. Then the angelic doctor teaches that the essential sorrow necessary for confession is a displeasure at having committed sin; and this sorrow is not in the sensitve part of the soul but in the will: for sensible sorrow is an effect of the displeasure of the will, which effect we are not always able to produce, because the inferior part does not always follow and obey the superior part of the soul. Whenever the will is displeased, above all things, at having committed sin, the confession is a good one.

6. Be careful to abstain from forced efforts to excite sensible sorrow. Remember that with regard to interior acts, the best are those which we perform with the least violence and with the greatest sweetness; for the Holy Ghost orders all things sweetly and peacefully. "Disponit omnia suaviter"—Sap. viii. 1. Hence, the holy penitent Ezechias said of the sorrow which he felt for his sins: "Behold, in peace is my bitterness most bitter"—Isaias 38. He felt great sorrow, but it was accompanied with peace. When you wish to receive absolution, be careful in your preparation for confession, first to ask of Jesus Christ and of Mary, in sorrow, a true sorrow for your sins. Make afterwards, as has been already said, a short examen of conscience, and then, as to the sorrow, it is enough for you to say with sincerity: My God, I love thee above all things: I hope, through the blood of Jesus Christ, for the pardon of all my sins, for which I am sorry with my whole heart, because by them I have offended and displeased thy infinite goodness: I abhor them above every evil, and I unite my abhorrence of them with the abhorrence which Jesus had for them in the garden of Gethsemani. I purpose, with thy grace, never more to offend thee. And as often as you have sincerely wished to make these acts, go in peace to receive absolution, without fear or scruple. St. Teresa gave another excellent means of removing anxiety about sorrow for sins. See, said the saint, if you have a sincere purpose not to commit the sins which you confess; if you have, doubt not but you have also true sorrow.

7. In the third place, a purpose to sin no more is necessary; and this purpose must be firm, universal, and efficacious. First, it must be firm. Some say: I would wish never more to commit this sin; I would wish never more to offend God. Alas! this I would wish denotes that the purpose is not firm. In order to have a firm purpose, you must say with a resolute will: I will never more commit sin; I will never more deliberately offend God. Secondly, it must be universal, so that the penitent will purpose to avoid all sins without exception, that is, all mortal sins. With regard to venial sins, it is sufficient for the validity of the sacrament to have sorrow for one species of them, and to have a firm purpose to avoid them. Spiritual souls should purpose to avoid all deliberate venial sins; and with regard to indeliberate venial sins, it is enough to resolve to guard against them according to the best of their ability; for it is impossible to avoid all indeliberate sins. Thirdly, the purpose of avoiding sin must be efficacious; that is, it must make the penitent adopt the means of not relapsing into the sins which he confesses, and must make him avoid the proximate occasions of a relapse. An occasion is called proximate in which a person has frequently fallen into grievous sins, or has been without a just cause an occasion of sin to others. It is not enough for penitents to purpose merely to renounce sin; it is necessary also to resolve to remove the occasion of it, otherwise all their confessions, though they should receive a thousand absolutions, will be null; for not to remove the proximate occasion of mortal sin is in itself a mortal sin. And as I have already shown in my Moral Theology (lib. 6, num. 454,) he who receives absolution without a firm purpose of removing the proximate occasions of mortal sin commits a new mortal sin, and is guilty of sacrilege.

8. But some one may say: If I separate from such a person, if I give up such a familiarity, scandal will be the consequence, and it will be an occasion of talk to the community. I answer: my sister, you are wrong; you will, on the contrary, give scandal by not removing the occasion, for the religious are aware of the friendship; and be assured, that although they may not speak in your presence, they think your conduct deserving of blame. But you will say: To separate from such a one would be an act of incivility, and even of ingratitude, for she assists me, serves me, and relieves me. She assists you—yes, she helps to remove you from God, and to make you lead an unhappy life here, and a more unhappy life hereafter. Is it incivility or ingratitude? Civility and gratitude are first due to Jesus Christ, who is a Sovereign of infinite majesty, and from whom we have received immense benefits. You may add: but I have pledged my word not to separate from her. But did you not give your word to Jesus Christ, at your profession, that you would have no other lover but him? "Nullum præter ~~nam~~ amatorem admittam." Did you not give your word that you wish neither to love nor to be loved by any other than God? Do you not then see that it is passion that makes you speak in this manner, and makes you seek pretexts in order to bring you to eternal perdition? Ah! give no more pain to the heart of your spouse, who feels his heart, as it were, wounded at the sight of one of his spouses giving her affections to any other than to himself. To St. Ludgard, while she was miserably entangled in a dangerous friendship, Jesus appeared, and showed her his heart grievously wounded. The saint began to weep over her fault, and took leave of her friend, saying, that she could love no other than Jesus Christ to whom she had been espoused.

9. This is said only in passing, for proximate occasions scarcely ever occur in convents. But a nun may, perhaps, be tempted to conceal a sin in confession. A certain nun may have the misfortune of falling into mortal sin; the devil endeavours to lock her mouth, and to make her ashamed to confess her sin. Oh! God, how many souls shall, on account of this accursed shame, burn, and burn for ever in hell, or rather in the bottom of hell. Some Christians, through human respect, and through fear of losing the esteem of others, easily continue for months and years to make sacrilegious confessions and communions. In the Chronicles of the Discalced Carmelites (tom. 3, lib. 10, c. 34,) it is related that a young girl of great virtue consented to a sin against chastity; she concealed the sin three times in confession, and went to communion; after the third communion she suddenly fell dead. Because she was considered to be a saint, her body was laid in a particular part of the church of the Jesuits; but after the obsequies were finished, and the church closed, the confessor was conducted by two angels to the place of interment. She came forth, fell on her knees, and threw from her mouth, into a chalice prepared for them, the three consecrated hosts which had been sacrilegiously received and miraculously preserved in her breast. The angels stripped her of the scapular; the miserable girl instantly presented a horrible aspect, and was carried out of sight by two devils. But how can a Christian that has been so daring as to sin grievously against the divine Majesty, and has thus merited hell, where he should suffer eternal shame, find an excuse before God for concealing a sin in confession, in order to avoid the transient and trifling confusion which would arise from confessing it to a priest. If he wishes to be pardoned by God, and to deliver himself from the hell which he has deserved, the shame caused by the confession of his sin disposes him to receive pardon. It is but just that the man who has despised God should humble and confound himself. Adelaide, the sinner, gave a beautiful answer to the devil. Being called by God to a change of life, she was converted, and instantly resolved to make a good confession. The devil placed before her eyes the shame which she would suffer in confessing all her sins, and said to her: Adelaide, where are you going? She courageously answered: Filthy beast, do you ask me where I am going? I am going to confound myself and you.

10. Along with this shame the devil endeavours to fill the mind of sinners with many delusions and vain fears. Such a one says: My confessor will rebuke me severely if I tell this sin. Why should he rebuke you? Tell me, were you a confessor, would you speak harshly to a poor penitent who should come to manifest his miseries to you, in the hope of being raised up from his fallen state? How, then, can you imagine that a confessor, who is bound by his office to show charity to those who come to the tribunal of penance, should treat you with harshness and severity if you confess your sin to him? Another says: But the confessor will, at least, be scandalized at my sin, and will conceive a dislike for me. All false; he will not be scandalized, but will be edified, when he sees the good disposition which makes a sinner confess his sins with sincerity, in spite of the shame which he feels. And will he not have heard from other penitents similar, or perhaps more grievous sins? Oh! would to God that you were the only sinner in the world! Neither is it true that he will conceive a dislike for those who disclose their guilt to him; on the contrary, he will entertain a greater esteem for them, and will labour more zealously to assist them when he sees the confidence which they place in him, and which has made them reveal their miseries to him. Alas! what do certain sinners say: I will go to confession, but not till I get a strange confessor. And will they for the sake of avoiding shame, live in the mean time in enmity with God; in danger of being lost for ever—in a present hell, caused by the remorses of conscience which lacerate the soul, and which leave them without peace night or day? Father, they say, I have unfortunately fallen into sin, but I will not despair on that account. They say: I will confess it to a strange confessor. And will they remain in sin, or add several sacrileges to the sin they have committed? Do they not know that sacrilege is a horrible sin? Will they change into the poison of eternal death the remedy which Jesus Christ has prepared for them by his blood in the sacrament of penance? I will, they say, go to confession hereafter. But what shall become of them for eternity if they meet a sudden death, which is now so frequent that we hear almost every day that some one has died suddenly?

11. But some say I have not confidence in my confessor. Go, then, to another. Should a nun ever have the misfortune of falling into this delusion let her ask a confessor from the bishop. But should a person not be able to procure a strange confessor, would it not be madness to conceal his sin? Were he afflicted with an ulcer, which might cause death, would he not, if there were no other remedy, instantly call for a surgeon, and, however great his shame, would he not make known his disease? And, in order to recover the life of the soul, and to escape hell, a Christian cannot bring himself to open his conscience to a spiritual father! Let all remember that it is not enough to say: I accuse myself of all the sins I have committed since my childhood, as they are before God. If they do not open their conscience, these words only serve to add to their delusion and danger of damnation.

12. Christians, then, should have courage, and generously conquer this shame, which the devil magnifies so much in their mind. It will be enough to begin to reveal the sin which they have committed; all their vain apprehensions will instantly vanish. And they may be persuaded that after confession they will feel more happy at having confessed their sins than if they were made monarchs of all the earth. Let them recommend themselves to most holy Mary, and she will obtain for them strength to overcome all repugnance. And if they have not courage to disclose their sins at once to the confessor, let them say to him: Father, assist me, for I stand in need of help: I have committed a certain sin which I cannot bring myself to confess. The confessor will adopt an easy means of dragging from its den the wild beast that devours them. It will be enough for them to answer, yes or no, to his interrogations. Oh! let them do this: should a person be unwilling to tell his sin in words, he may write it on paper, and show it to the confessor, saying: I accuse myself of the sin you have read. And behold, the eternal and temporal hell has disappeared, the grace of God is recovered, and with it peace of conscience. The greater the violence a person does himself in order to conquer shame, the greater will be the affection with which God will embrace him. Father Paul Segneri the younger (see his life by Muratori) relates that a certain person made such an effort to confess certain sins committed in her infancy, that, in disclosing them to her confessor, she swooned away. But, in return for the violence she had done herself, the Lord gave her such fervent compunction that thenceforward she gave herself up to a life of perfection and of great austerities, and died with the reputation of a saint.

13. But I do not wish that any soul be disturbed by what has been just said. What I have said is applicable only to those who have a consciousness of grievous and certain sins, and who, through shame, will not confess them. With regard to doubts which some may have of having committed certain sins, or of having made bad confessions, if they wish to disclose them to a confessor for their greater tranquillity, they will do well, unless they have a scrupulous conscience. For the scrupulous it is not advisable to confess their doubts, as shall be more fully explained hereafter. It may be useful for the timid to know certain doctrines approved by theologians, which may save them from a great deal of disquiet in conscience, and give them peace of mind. First, it is a solid and very probable opinion of divines that there is no obligation of confessing doubtful mortal sins, when a person doubts whether he had full advertence, or whether he gave a perfect and deliberate consent. The divines add, that at death there is an obligation either of making an act of perfect contrition, lest the doubtful sin should have been really grievous, or to tell, not the doubtful sin, but any certain sin (a venial sin is sufficient,) and to receive the sacrament of penance. But this is necessary only when a person, after the doubtful sin, had never received sacramental absolution. Many theologians of high authority also say that persons who have for a long time led a spiritual life, when doubtful whether they have consented to mortal sin, may remain certain of not having lost the grace of God; because it is morally impossible that a soul well confirmed in good purposes should be suddenly changed, and yield to mortal sin, without clearly perceiving that she had consented to it. For mortal sin is a monster so horrible that it cannot enter a soul that has for a long time abhorred it without producing on the mind a clear knowledge of its entrance into the soul. This is fully proved in my work on Moral Theology—Lib. 6, num. 450 et 476, vers. item.

14. Secondly, when it is certain that a mortal sin has been committed, and when there is a doubt whether it has been ever confessed, then if the doubt be a negative one, that is, if there be no reason to judge that it has been confessed, it is certainly necessary to tell the sin in confession.

But when there is reason to believe, or a well-founded presumption that the sin has been once told, then, according to the common opinion of divines, there is no obligation of confessing it. Hence, divines commonly teach, that if a person who has made his general or particular confessions with sufficient diligence doubts whether he has forgotten in confession a certain sin (or circumstance of sin,) he is not bound to confess; because he can prudently judge that it has been already sufficiently confessed.—Theolo. Mor. lib. 6, n. 477. He need not confess the sin, though he should feel a great unwillingness to disclose the doubt which tormented him. But such a person may say: if I were bound to tell such a thing I should feel great shame. But what does it matter that you are ashamed to tell it? As long as you are not obliged to confess it be not troubled. The confession of certain natural actions should also cause shame, but you are not therefore obliged to mention them. Thus for example, you are not obliged to confess certain acts of levity or immodest jests which occured in your childhood, without a knowledge of their malice. Nor is your having done these acts in secret a certain proof of malice; for children do certain natural actions secretly, though these actions are not sins. Hence, we are not bound to accuse ourselves in particular of such things, unless when we remember that we committed them with an impression, or at least with a doubt, that they were grievous sins. It is, then, enough for a person to say within himself: Lord, if I really knew that I was bound to confess these things, I would readily confess them, though I should suffer every pain.

15. This is intended for the comfort of timorous souls who feel great anxiety, arising from a fear that they did not well know how to explain all their doubts in confession. But it is useful for all, at least for their humiliation, to make known to their director the doubts by which they are troubled. I except the scrupulous, for they should not speak of their doubts, as shall be explained more fully in the following chapter. What I would advise is, that all would explain to their confessors their passions, attachments, and the causes of their temptations, that he may be able to cut off the roots, which, if not extirpated, will never cease to cause temptations, and will expose the soul to great danger of consenting to sin, when she can, but will not, remove the cause. It will also be very profitable to some to disclose the temptations which are most humiliating, particularly thoughts against chastity, though there should be no consent. St. Philip Neri used to say that a temptation disclosed is half conquered. I have said that it is very profitable to some: for with regard to others of tried virtue, who are too timid on this point, and are always afraid of having consented to sin, it is sometimes useful to forbid them to confess such temptations, unless they are certain of having yielded to them. For (as has been said elsewhere) by the very examination which such persons make, in order to ascertain whether they have consented or not, and to think of the manner in which they will explain the temptation, the images of the bad objects presented to the mind become more vivid, and the soul becomes more agitated by repeated apprehensions of consent. Obey your confessor on this point, and be regulated by his advice. What I recommend to you is to be sincere and faithful in disclosing to your spiritual father all the secrets of your conscience, and in explaining all things to him as they really are. I also recommend you, in confessing your faults, to abstain from excusing them. The soul that excuses and covers her defects shows that she has but little sorrow for the sins which she confesses. I know not how a person can have sincere sorrow for a fault for the commission of which he thinks he had just reason. The confession of some consists in exaggerating the occasions which led them to yield to impatience or to some other defects. But of what use, I ask, are such exaggerations? Confess the fault you have committed, and omit the cause which led you into it.

16. Guard also against useless discourses at confession. Of what use is it to relate to the confessor all the occasions of displeasure which you have received from others, or to make many complaints about your infirmities and tribulations? Were you to cut off all these tales, a quarter of an hour should be abundantly sufficient for your confession, in which your principal object should be to get rid of some habitual fault, or to advance in perfection. Some at every confession recite the same tale which they have learned by heart: the recital of it lasts at least half a quarter of an hour. I accuse myself, they say, of the little love I have had for God, of not having fulfilled my obligations, of not having loved my neighbour as I ought, and the like. Of what use are such accusations? All lost time. St. Catherine of Bologna wished that her nuns should speak to the confessor of nothing but of the state of their conscience. St. Teresa says, that "after having told their sins, received absolution, and asked (if necessary) some spiritual advice from the confessor, a nun should retire immediately; for spiritual discourses when long, easily infuse an affection which, though not bad is at least not holy." St. Catherine of Sienna used to say: "Religious should not introduce unnecessary conversation with their confessor." Thus a religious will be always disengaged, and will not be disturbed when deprived of her spiritual father. However, when the confessor speaks to you on the direction of your conscience, be careful not to interrupt him, and to attend to what he says without thinking of anything else. There are some who are very anxious to speak to the confessor, but when he speaks they pay very little attention to his admonitions. St. Francis de Sales used to say that great importance should be attached to the words of a priest in the tribunal of penance, because then he holds the place of God, who enlightens him in a special manner to say what is conducive to our spiritual welfare.

17. Some religious wish to live without a director, and imagine that having the rules and the superior they stand in need of no other guide. But they err: for along with the rules and the superior nuns should have a confessor to direct the interior exercises, and to admonish and guide them, even in what regards their exterior employments. It is true, says St. Gregory, that some saints have been directed immediately by God himself; "but," adds the saint, "such examples are to be venerated but not imitated, lest while a person disdains to be the disciple of a man, he may become a teacher of error"—Dial. lib. 1, cap. 1. Virtue holds the middle place. As in the spiritual life sloth is criminal, so indiscretion is a vice. It is the business of a director to direct and moderate both, and therefore a guide is necessary. When a religious has not a director who is able to guide her soul to perfection, God supplies the deficiency; but to refuse the guidance of a minister of God, when it can be had, is an act of temerity which the Lord will punish by permitting the soul to fall into many errors. God could guide us all by himself, but to make us humble he wishes that we submit to his ministers, and depend on their directions. Cassian relates (Coll. 2, cap. 3,) that a solitary in the desert, dying of hunger, refused some loaves which had been offered to him, saying that he expected from God a supply of food: the unfortunate man died miserably. Now, I may be asked why did the Lord send for many years, by means of a crow, a loaf to St. Paul the hermit, and refuse to provide for this solitary? The answer is evident. St. Paul had no means of supporting life; and the solitary refused the food which had been offered to him, and therefore God abandoned him. Now, what is said of corporal food is likewise true with regard to the food of the soul. Hence, Cassian concludes that they who refuse the guidance of the wise do not deserve to be guided by God.

18. The choice of a spiritual father should not be made by accident nor through predilection. You should select the person whom you consider best qualified to promote your spiritual progress, and who is not only a man of learning and experience, but also a man who practices prayer and walks in the way of perfection. A vessel can give no other wine than that which it contains. St. Teresa says that "if directors are not men of prayer, their learning will be of little use." When you have chosen a guide you should not change him without a just reason. You ought not leave your confessor, but should rather adhere more closely to his directions when he reproves your faults. To his son, the heir of his kingdom, St. Lewis, king of France, bequeathed the following advice: "My son, select a confessor who knows how to direct you, and who has at the same time courage to reprove you as often as reproof is necessary." There is no confessor more injurious than the priest who seldom reproves, and treats with too much indulgence the faults of his penitents; for by such indulgence he makes them think little of their defects. If, then, blessed sister, you find a confessor who conducts you by the narrow way, and who, when he sees that you commit voluntary faults, reproves you with severity, have a great esteem for him, and do not ever leave him.

19. Obey your director, and do not depart from his directions, even when what you wish to do in opposition to his advice appears good in your eyes. In the lives of the ancient fathers it is related that a young man far advanced in virtue, disregarding the advice of his spiritual father, resolved to leave the monastery and to go into the desert in order to live in solitude. But what was the result? From the desert he went to live with his relatives, and in their society he forgot the desert, and abandoned himself to a life of tepidity. But, perhaps, you will tell me that you have been badly directed by your confessor, and of this other spiritual fathers have assured you. In the first place, I answer, that you can scarcely have erred by obedience to your director; but if you have fallen into an error, do you know why you have erred? It is because you have been obedient in some things and not in others. With such imperfect obedience God is not bound to co-operate. But place yourself entirely in the hands of your director, with a firm determination to obey him in all things, and then the Lord will never permit you to err. Though your confessor should not have all the learning that you would desire, yet will take care to supply the defect. For it is not possible that a soul desirous of becoming a saint, and placing all her confidence in God, should be deluded when she faithfully obeys his minister.

20. From this I infer that it is impossible for a nun to err when she regulates her conduct by the advice of the ordinary confessor, though he may be changed from time to time. That great servant of God, Sister Paula Centurion, used to say: "To me every confessor appears the same, because every confessor applies the blood of Jesus Christ to cure the wounds of my soul." When a new confessor comes to the convent, it will be enough for you to give him a general knowledge of your conscience. You should then place yourself under his direction. For the nun who sincerely wishes to become a saint, and wishes for nothing but God, every confessor who is appointed by her prelate is a safe guide. A religious only wants a good will and a determined resolution to refuse self-love every gratification, in order to find in all things the sole pleasure of God. Hence the venerable Sister Ursula Benincasa used to say to her religious: "My dear sisters, be persuaded that no director can make you saints unless you are resolved to mortify self-will and your passions."

PRAYER.

Ah! my Jesus, thou hast suffered so much, thou hast given thy blood and thy life in order to place me under the necessity of loving thee, and I have repaid thee with ingratitude. How often have I, for a miserable gratification, turned my back on thee, and have lost thy grace. I knew that in committing sin I gave thee great displeasure, and with this knowledge I have consented to sin. Ah! my dear Redeemer, pardon me for the sake of the blood which thou hast shed for me. "Assist, we beseech thee, thy servants, whom thou hast redeemed by thy precious blood." I am sorry with my whole heart for having offended thy infinite goodness. Lord, increase my sorrow; give me a sorrow for my sins, which will make me always weep till death over the injuries I have done thee. Had I died in my sins I could never more love thee. Since thou givest me time to love thee I wish to love thee ardently, and to love nothing but thee. I love thee, O my Sovereign Good, I love thee with my whole heart, and because I love thee I give my entire will to thee. Give me grace to love thee always for the future, and then do with me, and dispose of me as thou pleasest. I accept all thy arrangements. Grant that in all temptations and in all dangers of sin I may never cease to recommend myself to thee. O Mary, my mother, obtain for me the grace that in my temptations I may always have recourse to God, and to thee who art all-powerful with God. Amen.

SECTION II.

On Scruples.

1. A SCRUPLE is nothing else than a vain fear of sinning, which arises from false and groundless apprehensions. These scruples are useful in the beginning of conversion. For a soul that has but a short time renounced sin, stands in need of repeated purgations. Scruples produce this effect: they cleanse the soul, and at the same time make her careful to avoid real sins, and they also render her humble; so that, distrusting her own opinion, she places herself in the hands of her spiritual father to be directed as he pleases. St. Francis de Sales used to say, that "the fear which begets scruples in those who have lately gone from the confines of sin, is a certain presage of future purity of conscience." But, on the other hand, scruples are hurtful to those who seek perfection, and have for a long time given themselves to God. In such persons, says St. Teresa, scruples produce extravagant impressions, which bring the soul to such a state that she will not advance a single step towards perfection. St. Francis de Sales has written: "Be diligent, but guard against inquietudes; for there is no greater obstacle to advancement in perfection."

2. It is, however, necessary to make a distinction between scrupulous consciences. Some nuns boast of being free, and are ashamed to be considered scrupulous, and therefore they give themselves up to a tepid life. They give and receive presents as they please; they disregard rule, saying that it is not binding; they give liberty to the eyes, to the tongue, to the ears, to see, to speak, and to hear whatever they please. They blush to appear mortified, and censure those who practice mortification; they call it affectation and singularity to speak in a low tone, and to keep the eyes cast down. Hence, they are easily led by the imperfect to join in vain amusements. Let such cease to boast of freedom of conscience, for they are at least tepid and imperfect religious. Would to God that they were scrupulous; that is, that they had, as they ought to have, a delicate conscience. But let such religious beware, lest they be of the number of those who, as David says, fol low like sheep the bad example of others, and find themselves one day confined with them in hell. "They are laid in hell like sheep"—Ps. xlviii. To refuse to lose time in the parlour, or on the terrace, to refuse to speak in the choir, or in time of silence, or to avoid telling a lie, however small, are signs, not of a scrupulous, but of a delicate conscience, which every religious ought to have.

3. The marks of a scrupulous conscience are the following: first, to be always afraid of not having at confession true sorrow, or a sincere purpose of amendment. Secondly, to be afraid, on frivolous grounds, of sinning in every action —for example, of always consenting to rash judgments, or to every bad thought which presents itself to the mind. Thirdly, to be in constant doubts, considering an action at one time to be lawful, and at another unlawful, and to be at the same time disturbed with great fears and perplexities. Fourthly, not to be calmed by the decision of a confessor, etc. To decide whether a penitent is scrupulous or not, belongs not to the penitent but to the confessor; for all scrupulous persons say that their scruples are not scruples, but real doubts and sins. If they knew them to be scruples, they would disregard them. They are in the dark, and therefore they do not see the state of their conscience. The confessor, who is free from the darkness in which they are involved, understands it well. Hence, the penitent should obey his advice; if she wish to decide for herself, the more she labours to tranquillize her conscience by her own opinions, the greater will be her confusion and agitation of mind; and, as shall be hereafter shown, she will, perhaps, expose herself to the danger of perdition.

4. With regard to those who walk in the way of perfection, the devil ordinarily fills their mind with scruples and troubles, that in order to get rid of them, they may give up the practice of virtue, or abandon themselves to despair, and voluntarily take away their own lives. And has not this happened to several? A modern, but learned author (Scaramelli, Dir. Ascet. tr. 2, n. 438) relates that he himself had known two persons, one of whom was led by scruples to inflict on his breast several wounds with a knife, and the other shot himself, and instantly fell dead. I know a person who, on account of similar anxieties of conscience, threw himself out from a window, but escaped from death; and at another time, intended to cast himself into a well, but was prevented by another person. We read of several cases of scrupulous persons who have taken away their own lives. The devil labours at least to disturb religious by scruples, in order to render them unable to go to communion, to say the divine office, and if possible, to make them lose their reason and become foolish, or to render the way of perfection hateful, that thus they may give up mental prayer, the frequentation of the sacraments, and that by degrees, losing the aid and love of God, they may abandon themselves to a tepid life, and pass from scruples to real sins. Hence, many theologians say, that when directed by her confessor to act with freedom and to conquer scruples, a scrupulous person not only can, but ought to obey his directions, and should she act otherwise, she is guilty of sin, because she does injury to herself, by making herself unable to advance in the way of God, and because she exposes herself to the danger of losing her health, her reason, and her soul, by abandoning herself to vice.

5. The spiritual masters prescribe many remedies against scruples, but the generality of theologians, as well as the ascetics, say that the principal and only remedy for a penitent is to place herself in the hands of a spiritual father, and to obey him blindly, distrusting entirely her own judgment. St. Philip Neri used to say, that there is nothing more dangerous than to direct one's own conscience. A scrupulous person who is not obedient to her director is lost. St. John of the Cross says, that not to submit to the judgment of a confessor is pride and want of faith.—Tom. 3, Tract. delle. spine. Coll. 4, sec. 2, n. 8. And justly, for Jesus Christ has declared that they who obey his priests obey himself, and that they who despise them despise him: "He that heareth you heareth me; and he that despiseth you, despiseth me"—Luke x. 16. Hence, the same St. John of the Cross (loc. cit.,) speaking in the name of the Lord to a penitent who disobeys her director, says: "Being unfaithful to your confessors, you are also unfaithful to me, who have said, he that despises you, despises me. But, on the other hand, they who obey a spiritual father cannot err." St. Bernard teaches, that "whatever a man holding the place of God commands, when we are not certain that it is displeasing to God, ought to be received as if commanded by God himself"—De discip. cap. 11.

6. Hence, Blessed Henry Suson used to say (Apud. P. Brencola,) that God does not demand an account of what is done through obedience. St. Philip Neri taught the same to his penitents. Let them, he would say, who desire to advance in the way of God place themselves under a learned confessor and obey him as they would obey God. Whoever acts thus is certain of not having to render to God an account of his actions. Hence the saint exhorts penitents to have confidence in their confessor, because the Lord will not allow him to err. Should a person become blind, what other remedy, I ask, can he have than a faithful guide, who will conduct him in the way in which he has to walk? And in like manner, a soul that finds herself in a state of darkness and confusion, on account of her scruples, should allow herself to be conducted by the guide whom God has given her, and ought to obey him blindly. I say, by the guide whom God has given her, for, ordinarily speaking, a penitent agitated by scruples would do well to speak of her doubts to her own confessor only; for others, though holy and learned, in consequence of not understanding the state of her conscience, may ask a question or drop a word, not in accordance with the sentiments of her own director. Behold, that word will again throw her conscience into a state of confusion, and losing her former confidence in the confessor, she will be for ever, or at least for a long time, disturbed and agitated.

7. Obey, then, your director, O blessed sister, and fear not that in obeying him you may be led astray. This was the practice of the saints, who have been often troubled with perplexities and fears of conscience, and thus they obtained tranquillity of conscience. St. Catherine of Bologna was afflicted with scruples, but she followed in all things the advice of her director. She was sometimes afraid to approach the holy communion, but in spite of all her fears she obeyed her spiritual father and communicated. Jesus Christ appeared one day to her to animate her still more to obedience, and told her to have courage; because by her obedience she gave him great pleasure. Our Saviour also appeared to blessed Stephana Sonziano, of the Order of St. Dominick, and said to her: "Since you have placed your will in the hands of your confessor, who represents my person, ask me for any grace and it shall be granted." The same advice was given by St. Augustine to his friend St. Paulinus, by whom he was consulted about doubts of conscience. "Confer ea," was the reply of the holy doctor, "cum aliquo cordis medico, et quod per illum tibi loquentem Dominus aperuerit, scribe mihi"—Ep. ad Paul. 20. State your doubts to a spiritual physician, and let me know what the Lord will say to you through him. Hence St. Augustine held as certain, that should St. Paulinus consult a spiritual father, God would certainly have spoken to him through his director, and would make known to him the divine will. St. Antonine relates (p. 1, tit. 3, cap. 10, sec. 10,) that to a religious of the order of St. Dominick, who was harassed by scruples, a deceased religious appeared and gave the following advice: "Consule discretos, et acquiesce eis." Consult with the wise and acquiesce in their advice. The same holy archbishop relates that a disciple of St. Bernard was reduced to such a state by scruples, that he could no longer say mass; but in this disturbed state he asked advice from his holy master, and St. Bernard said to him, without giving any reason for the counsel: "Go and say mass; I take it on my conscience." The monk obeyed, and thenceforward was freed from all his troubles of conscience.

8. It is useless to say, had I St. Bernard for my confessor, I too would obey him blindly; but my confessor is not a St. Bernard. He is not a St. Bernard, but he is more than a St. Bernard, for he holds the place of God. Listen to the advice of Gerson: "Whoever ye are that speak in this manner, you err; for you have not entrusted your soul to the hands of a man because he is learned, but because he is placed over you. Wherefore, obey him, not as a man but as God"—Tract. de præp. ad Miss. You who speak thus, says this learned author, err; for you have not placed yourself in the hands of a man because he is learned or holy, but because God has given him to you for a guide. Obey, him then, not as a man but as God, and you shall never err. In the beginning of his conversion St. Ignatius of Loyola was so violently assailed by scruples and so encompassed with darkness that he found no peace. But because he had true faith in the words of God ('he that heareth you heareth me,') he said with great confidence: Lord, show me the way in which I ought to walk: and though you should give me a dog for my guide I will faithfully follow him. And because the saint was faithful in obeying his director, he was not only delivered from his scruples but also became an excellent guide for others. Hence, St. Teresa has well said: "Let a soul choose a confessor with a determination not to seek any longer an excuse for self-will, but to trust in the words of the Lord, "he that heareth you, heareth me." Our Lord sets so great a value on this submission, that though it may be after a thousand struggles, and with a persuasion of the imprudence of the confessor's opinion, that though it may be with or without pain that we follow his advice, he will assist us so much that he will certainly make us conform to his divine will"—Foundations, chap. 18. If, blessed sister, Jesus Christ at judgment should demand an account of what you have done in obedience to your director, you can say in answer: "Lord, I have done this to obey thy minister whom thou hast commanded me to hear." Say this to him, and fear not that he will condemn you. Father James Alvarez has written (lib. 1, p. 3, cap. 12) that though a confessor should by chance make a mistake, the penitent in obeying him is secure and does not err. And are you, in order to be secure against error, obliged to examine whether the confessor has sufficient learning? When he has been lawfully approved by the bishop, as you are bound to suppose, he holds the place of God in your regard, and you cannot err in following his advice.

9. But, you will say, I am not scrupulous; my anxieties are not vain but well founded fears. I answer: no fool esteems himself foolish, but his folly consists in being a fool without knowing it. And in like manner, I say to you, that you are scrupulous as your director considers you to be, because you do not see the groundlessness of your scruples. Did they appear to you to be vain apprehensions you would disregard them, and would be no longer disturbed by them. Cast off your fears, then, and obey your confessor, who understands the state of your conscience. I hear you say in reply: the defect is not in the confessor but in me who am not able to explain myself, and therefore he cannot understand the miserable state of my soul. But you yield to so many foolish scruples, and you scruple not to charge your spiritual father either with ignorance or with sacrilege. When you confess doubts which, as you say, regard mortal sins, the confessor was obliged to make the interrogations necessary, in order to form a correct judgment of your doubts. Hence, if without just reason, or without understanding you, as you may imagine, he has commanded you to disregard these doubts as vain scruples, he must have acted either through ignorance or through malice. Then, by distrusting his advice, through fear that he did not sufficiently understand you, you, as I have said, charge him either with ignorance or with sacrilege: and for this very rash judgment do you feel no scruple? To nuns who begin to censure the decisions of their confessors we ought to say what the learned Monsignor Sperelli wrote to a religious who had accused her confessor of heresy, because he had said that the sins which she confessed were not sins: "Tell me," says the learned bishop to her, "in what university have you studied theology that you know better than your confessor how to decide on sins? Ah! go to spin, and do not give ear to such follies."

10. I will not say the same to you, but I tell you to acquiesce in all the directions of your spiritual father. When, after having once explained your doubts to him, he says that you have confessed your sins sufficiently, that he will hear no more, or when he tells you to be obedient, or to go to communion, etc., obey him without hesitation, and be assured that he has understood you sufficiently. You should not entertain any doubt about the correctness of his advice, but should obey him blindly and without reply, not asking the grounds of his opinion, but submitting in all things to his direction. If you desire to understand the reason of his advice, you will always be more perplexed, and will relapse into your troubles of conscience. Obey blindly, that is, without asking reasons. Be careful, then, never to examine the directions of your confessor. Scruples are, as it were, a species of pitch, which the more it is handled the more it adheres; the more you reflect on them the more they will fill your mind with darkness. Keep before your eyes the following beautiful maxims of St. Francis of Sales:—First, a soul should be satisfied when she is told by her spiritual father that she is going on well, and should not seek greater certainty. Secondly, it is better for us to walk blindly under divine Providence, amidst the darkness and perplexities of this life. Thirdly, an obedient soul has never been lost. This last maxim should calm your mind on all occasions. In a word, keep before your eyes this great rule, that in obeying your confessor you obey God; force yourself, then, to obey him in spite of all fears. And be persuaded that if you are not obedient to him it will be impossible for you to go on well; but if you obey you are secure. But you say, if I am damned in consequence of obeying my confessor, who will rescue me from hell? What you say is impossible; for it is not possible that obedience, which is the secure way to heaven, should be for you the road to hell.

11. Let us now come to what is practical. Ordinarily speaking, there are two sources of scruples by which the scrupulous are generally tormented. The first regards the past; the second regards the future; some are afraid of not having confessed their sins as they ought; others are afraid that they commit sin in every action. With regard to the past, scrupulous nuns would wish to be continually employed in making general confessions, with the hope of thus removing their fears and troubles. But what is the result? Their perplexities are increased; because new apprehensions and scruples of having omitted, or of not having sufficiently explained their sins, are continually excited. Hence, the more they multiply confessions the more their inquietudes increase. There is no doubt but a general confession is most useful for those who have never made one. It contributes greatly to humble the soul by bringing before her view all the irregularities of her past life. It also contributes to increase her sorrow for her ingratitude towards God, and to make her adopt holy resolutions for the future. It also gives the confessor a better knowledge of the state of her conscience, of the virtues she needs, and of the passions and vices to which she is most inclined; thus he will be better able to apply remedies and to give advice. But for those who have once made a general confession it is not useful to repeat it. Should a doubt afterwards arise, a penitent who does not remember to have intentionally omitted any sin in confession is (generally speaking) not obliged to confess any sin unless she is certain that it is a grievous sin, and that she never mentioned it in confession.

12. But you may say, if the sin be really a mortal sin, and if I have not confessed it, will I be saved? Yes, you will be saved; for the divines, along with St. Thomas (Supp. 3, q. p. 10, a. 5,) teach, that if, after a diligent search, a mortal sin has been omitted through forgetfulness, it is indirectly remitted by the absolution. It is true that when the penitent remembers it, or has just reason to doubt whether it was ever confessed, she is bound to mention it; but when (as has been stated in the preceding paragraph) she can prudently judge that it was told in some past confession, she is not bound to confess it. I have said she is not obliged to confess it, and this holds for all; but a soul tortured by scruples is according to the divines, not obliged to confess a past sin unless she can swear that it was certainly a mortal sin, and that is was never told in any confession. For the repetition of past sins may be productive of grievous detriment to a soul, and may drive her to despair. And when a penitent finds herself greatly agitated and confused in endeavouring to decide whether she can swear or not to the certainty of the sin, the confessor can in such a case exempt her from confessing sins of her past life; for in a case of so much danger and evil to the penitent the obligation of providing for the integrity of the confession ceases: for, as the divines commonly teach, a less inconvenience excuses from the integrity of the confession. Hence, to conclude this point, scrupulous persons should understand that a general confession is useful for others, but very dangerous and injurious to them. Hence, good directors do not permit scrupulous persons to speak of past sins. The remedy for them is not to explain, but to be silent and to obey; hence, when they wish to speak of past sins, the confessor must not listen to them, for if he once permits them to speak, they will be always disturbed when they do not explain their doubts.

13. I have said so much regarding general confessions: as to the ordinary confessions, it is not necessary for religious, who seek perfection, and communicate frequently, to receive absolution before each communion; it is enough for them to receive absolution once or twice in the week, and when they fall into any deliberate venial sin. St. Francis de Sales, in one of his letters, says that even when persons who walk in the way of perfection commit a deliberate venial fault, they ought not to omit communion because they have not the opportunity of going to confession. For, as the Council of Trent teaches, there are other means of obtaining the remission of venial sins, such as acts of contrition and of love. I have read that St. Matilda, not having an opportunity of confessing certain acts of negligence, made an act of contrition and went to communion. After communion, Jesus Christ appeared to her, and said that she had acted rightly A certain learned priest used to say that it is sometimes more profitable to the soul to go to communion after a venial sin, without confession than if she had gone to confession and received absolution before communion. For the soul will then make so many acts of contrition for the fault she has committed that she will receive the holy communion with greater fervour and humility.

14. With regard to those who are afraid of committing sin in all their actions, or of consenting to every bad thought that starts up in the mind, it is necessary to know two things: first, that feeling is one thing and consent another. The motions of sense, which naturally arise, are never sins when the will resists them. Neither should a person scruple having given cause to them, when the cause has been placed for a good end—that is, for spiritual or temporal utility. The second is, that, in order to commit mortal sin, the full advertence of the understanding, as well as the full consent of the will, is necessary: if either be wanting, the sin is not grievous. And in cases of doubt, timorous, and particularly scrupulous souls (as has been already said, n. 13,) ought to feel certain that they have not sinned grievously unless they can affirm with certainty that they have consented to mortal sin. And here it may be useful to remark, that for certain very timid souls, who are always in doubt about having consented to bad thoughts, it is better sometimes not to accuse themselves of certain temptations: for example, of temptations to hatred, against faith, or purity because, by examining whether they have given a deliberate consent, and how they shall explain their temptations, images of bad objects are excited still more vividly in the mind, and their agitation is increased by the fear of having given a new consent. Such souls should be told to accuse themselves of such thoughts in a general way, saying: I accuse myself of all the negligences I have been guilty of in not banishing bad thoughts.

15. There are two privileges, then, given to the scrupulous soul, by the generality of divines (by St. Antonine, Navarre, Suares, and many others.) The first is, that by acting with a fear or scruple she is not guilty of sin as long as she acts through obedience. And it is not necessary for her to form expressly at each act a practical judgment of the lawfulness of her actions, by reflecting that she is acting according to obedience. To exempt her from all fault, it is enough for her to make a virtual judgment—that is, it is enough for her to act in virtue of a judgment already formed, that such fears ought to be disregarded. Nor can it be said that the soul then acts with a practical doubt about the unlawfulness of the action: it is one thing to act with a practical doubt, and another to act with a fear of its sinfulness. Gerson justly teaches, that to act with a doubt, which arises from a formed conscience, or after a person has examined the circumstances, and come to the conclusion that while the doubt remains he cannot act without sin, would be to act with a practical doubt, and would be sinful. But when the mind is perplexed, vacillating amid doubts, and not knowing what opinion to adopt, but, at the same time resolved not to do anything displeasing to God, such a doubt is not, according to Gerson, a practical doubt, but a vain fear and scruple, which should be as much as possible rejected and despised. Behold his words: "A conscience is formed, when, after inquiry and deliberation, a person judges by a definitive sentence that an act is to be performed or omitted. And to act against such a conscience is a sin. A fear or scruple of conscience consists in a vacillation of the mind between doubts; the soul knows not whether she is bound to do or to omit the act, but would not wish to omit what she knows to be pleasing to the divine will; and such fear should be as much as possible rejected and extinguished"—Tract de Consc. et Scrup. Hence, when a soul has a firm purpose not to offend God, and acts according to obedience in overcoming scruples, she is not guilty of sin, though she acts with fear, and though she does not actually advert to the command of her director.

10. The second privilege of the scrupulous is, that after having acted they should believe that they have not given consent to any temptation, unless they are certain of having fully adverted and consented to the malice of the sin. Hence, when they are doubtful, their very doubt is a certain sign that they either had not full advertence or that they did not give a full consent. Hence, if the confessor tells them not to confess such doubts, they ought to obey, and should not think of leaving him if he persists in refusing to listen to the explanation of their doubts. I add, that the spiritual father who is indulgent in hearing the doubts of scrupulous souls falls into a great error; for, by scrutinizing their consciences, they generally become disquieted, and are rendered more incapable of advancing in the way of God. What has been just said does not regard so much the direction of penitents as of confessors in the guidance of souls. Penitents have only to submit their judgment to their spiritual father, and to obey him in all things. However, it may be useful to certain penitents to know what has been just said for the direction of confessors, that when their confessor tells them not to accuse themselves of certain sins, nor to speak of them unless they are certain of having committed a grievous fault; or when, after having heard them, he sends them to communion without absolution, they may not begin to contend with him, but may obey blindly, without even asking a reason for the command which he has imposed upon them.

17. But some may say: I wish to act with a certainty of not giving displeasure to God. I answer, that the greatest security which you (who have a troubled conscience) can have is to obey your director, and to conquer scruples in spite of the actual fear which molests you. And you know that, though you were at the point of death, you would be obliged to act in this manner in order to avoid the delusions of the devil. And here I repeat what I have already said (n. 4,) that you ought to scruple not doing violence to yourself in order to conquer scruples by acting against them, in obedience to your spiritual father, even though you may not be persuaded that your scruples are vain fears. For if you omit an act on account of the scruple you shall not be able to make any further progress in the way of God, and (as has been said) you will expose yourself to the danger of losing your soul or your reason; and to expose yourself to such danger is a certain sin. Hence, the devil excites so many fears in scrupulous persons that they may either abandon themselves to a tepid life, or may become fools; or at least that they may not advance in perfection, and live always amid troubles and confusion, in which hell always gains something. St. Louis Gonzaga used to say, that in troubled water the devil always finds fish to catch.

18. If, then, you wish to go on well and securely, obey punctually all the commands and directions of your confessor. And beg of him to prescribe not only particular, but also general, rules for your direction. I say general; for example to overcome and disregard scruples, as long as it is not evident that what you scruple is a grievous sin; or not to confess anything unless you can swear that it was certainly a mortal sin, and unless you can also swear that it was never told in confession: or to go to communion always when you are not certain of having committed mortal sin: or never to repeat the divine office, or any part of it, unless you are certain of having omitted it; and other similar rules which are usually given to the scrupulous. For particular rules, that is, rules given by the confessor in particular cases which have occurred, are of little or no use for the direction of a soul tormented by scruples. She will always say that the second case is not like the first, on which she had the advice of the confessor, and thus the mind will be always full of confusion and inquietude.

19. I conclude by repeating always, obey, obey; and do not treat God as a tyrant. It is true that he hates sin; but he cannot hate a soul that detests her sin, is sorry for it, and ready to die a thousand times rather than relapse into it. Tell me, if you had the love and affection for a fellow-creature which you now have for God, would you ever believe that a creature did not entertain a tender love for you? Oh! how good is God to a soul that has a good will! "How good," says the Royal Prophet, "is God to Israel, to them that are of a right heart"—Ps. lxxii. 1. The Lord cannot but receive with tenderness the soul that seeks him. "The Lord," says Jeremias, "is good . . . . . to the soul that seeketh him"—Lam. iii. 25. Our Lord said one day to St. Margaret of Cortona: Margaret, you seek me; but I seek you with far greater ardour than you seek me. Imagine that God says the same to you, if you love him and seek him. Abandon yourself into his arms, as the Psalmist exhorts you to do, and cast upon him the care of your soul, and he will preserve you, and will deliver you from all troubles. "Cast thy care upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee; he shall not suffer the just to waver for ever"—Ps. liv. 23. Be obedient, and cast away so many fears. Jesus said to the same St. Margaret, that her fears impeded her advancement in the divine love. Do not imagine that as long as you love him from the heart, God is provoked to wrath by every little fault which you commit. St. Teresa used to say: My children, be assured that God does not, as you imagine, attend to so many trifles; do not suffer your heart to be narrowed; if you do you may lose many blessings. Let your intention be pure, and your will resolved never to offend him. I repeat, then, and I say obey in all things your spiritual father and have confidence in obedience; for by the practice of obedience you shall always be secure. Keep always before your eyes this great lesson which St. Philip Neri used to repeat to his penitents: "Have confidence in your confessor, for the Lord will not allow him to err; there is no way of cutting the snares of the devil more secure than to do the will of another, and there is nothing more dangerous than to be directed by one's own opinion." In your meditations ask this grace of God, that he may make you practice obedience to your director. And fear not that if you practice it you will be saved, and will become a saint.

PRAYER.

My Jesus, because I love thee, all the pain arising from the troubles of my conscience, consists in the fear of displeasing and losing thee, who art an infinite Good. There was a time (and oh! that it had never been,) when I did not love thee, and cared but little to be loved by thee. But now I desire nothing but to love thee and to be loved by thee, my dear Redeemer. I do not wish ever more to displease thee. Thou knowest my wish to love thee at any cost; do not abandon me. If I have hitherto offended I now feel more pain at the offences I have offered to thee than if I lost all things, property, relatives, and life. Thou hast died for me, to thee I consign my soul; into thy hand I recommend it. "In manus tuas Domine commendo spiritu in meum." Thou lovest me, and therefore I abandon myself entirely into thy hands, and hope never to see myself confounded and in enmity with thee. "In thee, O Lord, have I hoped; never let me be confounded." My Jesus, I wish always to love thee. This I repeat, and hope to repeat during life, at death, and for all eternity. My Jesus, I love thee, and wish always to love thee. Mary, my hope, mother of mercy, assist me, have pity on me. Amen.

SECTION III.

On Communion. On Spiritual Communion, and Visitation of the Blessed Sacrament.

1. Of all the sacraments the adorable sacrament of the altar is the most excellent. The other sacraments contain the gifts of God, but the holy Eucharist contains God himself. Hence, St. Thomas says (3 part, q. 73, art. 3,) that the other sacraments have been instituted by Jesus Christ to prepare men either to receive or to administer the blessed Eucharist, which, according to the holy doctor, is the consummation of the spiritual life; because from this sacrament is derived all perfection. For all perfection consists in an union with God; and of all the means of uniting the soul with him there is none better than the holy communion, by which, as Jesus Christ himself has said, the soul becomes as it were one with him. "He that eateth my flesh ..... abideth in me, and I in him"—St. John, vi. 57. Hence, St. Chrysostom says, that Jesus has given his body to us under the species of bread, that we may become one with him. "Corpus suum in nos contemperavit ut unum quid simus"—Homily 61. And St. Cyril of Alexandria teaches, that as two pieces of wax melted together become one, so we, by holy communion, are similarly united with Jesus Christ. "Ut unum ex utrisque factum videatur"—St. Cyr. lib. 10, in Joan. c. 13. Hence, our Saviour instituted this sacrament under the form of food, to show that as corporal food is changed into our flesh, so this heavenly bread becomes one with us; but with this difference, that earthly food is converted into our substance, while this divine bread transforms those who eat it into Jesus Christ. "Eat and you shall be by grace what I am by nature"—Rupert in Exod. lib. 3, c. 12. "I will not be changed into you, but you shall be changed into me"—St. Augustine.

2. The principal effect of this sacrament is to preserve in the soul the life of grace. Hence, it is called bread; for as earthly bread supports corporal life, so this heavenly bread preserves the life of the soul, which consists in the grace of God. The Eucharist is, according to the Council of Trent, the divine medicine which purifies the soul from venial, and preserves her from mortal sins. "Antidotum quo liberamur a culpis quotidianis et a peccatis mortalibus preservamur"—Sess. 14, c. 2. Like a stream of water this sacrament extinguishes the ardour of the passions by which we are consumed. Let him in whose soul the flame of some particular passion is kindled approach the holy Communion, and he will find the passion altogether, or at least in a great measure, destroyed. "If any of you," says St. Bernard, "does not experience such frequent or such violent motions of anger, of envy, or of lust, let him give thanks to the body of the Lord, which produces fruit in his soul"—Serm. de Bap. in Cœna Dom. The angelic doctor teaches that the holy communion gives us strength to overcome all the attacks of the devil. "It repels every assault of the demons"—St. Tho. 3, p. q. 79, art. 1. St. Chrysostom asserts, that when we receive the holy Eucharist the devils are put to flight, and the angels run to our assistance. Moreover, this sacrament infuses into the soul great interior peace, a strong inclination to virtue, and a great willingness to practice it, and thus renders it easy to walk in the path of perfection.

3. The holy communion, as St. Thomas teaches, infuses divine charity into the heart. Jesus Christ protested that he came into the world for no other purpose than to kindle in our souls the holy fire of divine love. "I came to cast fire on the earth, and what will I but that it be kindled"—Luke xii. 49. The venerable Father Olimpio, of the order of Theatines, used to say, that there is no mystery of redemption better calculated to inflame us with the love of Jesus Christ than the sacrament of the altar, in which he gives himself entirely to us and pours forth all his love. Hence, speaking of the institution of this sacrament, St. John says: "Jesus knowing that his hour was come, to pass from this world to his Father, when he had loved his friends who were in the world, he loved them even to the end"—John xiii. 1. "He loved them to the end," that is, according to the commentators, he loved them to the utmost of his power. Hence, the Council of Trent said, that in this sacrament Jesus "poured forth, as it were, all the riches of his divine love towards man"—Sess. 13, cap. 2. The holy communion has been called by St. Thomas, "the sacrament of love," (Opusc. 30, c. 35); and by St. Bernard, the "love of loves." St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to call the day of communion "the day of love;" and would say that a soul after communion might exclaim with Jesus dying on the cross, "it is consummated." For after having given himself to me, God has nothing more to give; nor can I desire anything else from him.

4. Should not all, then, ardently desire to receive Jesus as often as possible in the holy communion? We know from the Acts of the Apostles that, in the first ages of the Church, all the faithful communicated every day. "Continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house"—Acts ii. 46. In the Syriac version, instead of "breaking bread," we find the words "breaking blessed bread," which express more clearly the blessed Eucharist. Besides, the interpreters of the Sacred Scripture, by the breaking of bread, understand the holy communion. Hence, according to St. Thomas (part 3, q. 80, art. 10, ad. 5,) it is certain that in the early ages all who assisted at mass received the communion. This fact is attested by St. Denis the Areopagite (Hier. eccl., c. 13,) and by St. Jerome, in his letters to Lucina and Pamachius, in which he states, that this pious practice was preserved in Rome and Spain even in his own time. By degrees the piety of the faithful began to grow cold; such was their lukewarmness in the time of Pope Fabian, that he had to command all Christians to approach the holy communion at least three times in the year, that is, on the festivals of Easter, Pentecost, and Christmas. In after ages the tepidity of Christians became so great, that Innocent the Third obliged all the faithful, under very severe penalties, to communicate at least at Easter. The decree of Innocent was afterwards confirmed by the Council of Trent—Sess. 13, chap. 9. These enactments of popes and councils do not prove that the practice of frequent communion is not very laudable; they only show the decay of the fervour which animated the first Christians.

5. Among the spiritual writers of the present day some are favourable and others opposed to frequent communion. I agree with the former, because, as the learned Petavius has shown in his work against the rigid Arnald, their opinion appears to be that of the holy fathers and of the Church. St. Basil, in a letter to a friend, states that it was to him a source of the greatest consolation to know that all the faithful of his diocese received the holy Eucharist four times in the week. In one place St. Augustine says: "I neither praise nor censure the practice of daily communion"—De eccl. Dogm. The holy doctor probably used these words because the practice of daily communion did not then prevail in Africa, and because it was censured by many. But in one of his sermons he exhorts the faithful to daily communion. "This," he says, "is daily bread; receive it every day, that you may daily draw fruit from it"—Serm. 28. St. Antonine relates that a certain prelate once reproved St. Catherine of Sienna for going to communion every day, and added, that St. Augustine neither praised nor censured daily communion. Then, replied the holy virgin, why do you rebuke me for a practice which St. Augustine would not censure? The sentiment of the Church may be inferred from the Council of Trent (Session 22, chap. 6,) where the holy synod expressed a strong desire that all the faithful who assisted at mass should communicate. In a decree of the Sacred Congregation, dated February 22, 1679, and approved by Innocent XI., it is asserted that the practice of frequent, and even of daily communion, was always praised by the holy fathers. In that decree the bishops of those places in which the faithful communicate every day are exhorted to give God thanks for it, and to cherish by all means so useful a devotion.

Bishops and parish priests are also forbidden to fix, by a general law, the days of the week on which the people are to communicate, and are commanded to leave their communions to the discretion of their confessors.

6. In the life of St. Margaret of Cortona, we read that our Lord told her that he would give a great reward to her confessor for having advised her to communicate often. It is related in the life of the venerable Anthony Torres, that after death he appeared in glory to a certain person, and said that his beatitude in heaven had been increased because he recommended frequent communion to his penitents. To the venerable Prudentiana Zagnoni, of the convent of St. Clare in Bologna, the Lord once said: "If you frequent the holy communion I will forget all your ingratitude." Lewis Blosius (Monil. Spir. cap. 6, sec. 1) writes, that of those who dissuaded others from the practice of frequent communion, Jesus Christ complained to St. Gertrude in these words: "My delights are to be with the children of men: to remain with them I have instituted the holy sacrament of the altar. Whosoever then prevents a soul from receiving me hinders my delights." Hence, John of Avila used to say that they who censured frequent communion perform the office of the devil, who detests the holy communion because souls derive from it great strength and fervour to advance in perfection.

7. According to St. Thomas (3. p. q. 80, a. 10) it is certain that frequent and even daily communion is in itself most useful, but only for those who have the proper dispositions, and not for all indiscriminately who are even in the state of grace. Hence, after having said, "receive daily that it may be every day profitable to you," St. Augustine adds: "live in such a manner that you may be worthy to receive every day"—Serm. 8. de verb. Dom. A person who commits deliberate venial sins, by telling wilful lies, by vanity of dress, by feelings of dislike, or by inordinate attachments, or who is guilty of any other similar faults, which she knows to be an obstacle to her advancement in perfection, and who does not endeavour to correct these defects, cannot be permitted to communicate more frequently than once a week. To receive strength to preserve her from falling into mortal sins she may be allowed communion every eight days. For my part, I should have great difficulty in allowing frequent communion to persons disposed to persevere in any defect, which, though not clearly a venial sin, would be certainly contrary to perfection, particularly if it were a defect against humility or obedience. But if a soul has no affection for any venial sin, if she abstains from deliberate venial sins, and attends to prayer and the mortifications of her passions and senses, the confessor may permit her to communicate three, four, or even five times in the week. And when a soul has attained a considerable degree of perfection, when she spends several hours in the day in mental prayer, and has moreover conquered the greater part of her evil inclinations, she may, according to St. Francis de Sales (chap. 20 of the Intro. to a Devout Life,) be allowed to communion every day. For, as St. Prosper says, this is the perfection which a person subject to human frailty can attain in this life. St. Thomas teaches that: "If any one finds by experience that by daily communion the fervour of his love is increased, and his reverence not diminished, such a person ought to communicate every day"—In 4 sent. 2. Distin. 2. q. 3. art. 1. sol. 1. Hence, in permitting more or less frequent communion to his penitents, a confessor should be regulated by the fruits of their communions. The same rule is given in a decree approved by Innocent XI. In that decree it is ordained that "frequent communion should be left to the decision of confessors, who ought to prescribe what they judge to be most profitable to their penitents, from the purity of their conscience, and from the fruit which they receive from frequent communion."

8. To regulate the frequency of your communions belongs not to you but to your director: to you it only belongs to make such preparation for the holy sacrament that your spiritual father may find in you the dispositions necessary for frequent communion. The preparation for frequent communion is two-fold: remote and proximate. The remote preparation consists in detachment from creatures. In his commentary on Psalm cxxxi., St. Augustine says: If you expected a visit from a great personage, to whom certain objects in your house should be offensive, would you not remove them before his arrival? When, then, you wish to receive Jesus Christ, you should remove from your heart all earthly affections which you know to be displeasing to him. He who wishes to communicate often must empty his heart of the things of the earth. This is precisely what our Lord once said to St. Gertrude: "I want nothing more from you than that you come to receive me with a heart divested of all self-love." As to the immediate preparation, you should begin it the evening before communion, by acts of love and of desire. As soon as you awake in the morning, consider that you are to receive Jesus Christ, and with a fervent aspiration invite your spouse to hasten into your soul. Immediately before communion you should, even though you had made mental prayer, excite in your soul lively sentiments of faith, of humility, and of desire.

9. First, you ought to animate your faith by reflecting on the majesty of him whom you are to receive. If faith did not assure us of it who could ever imagine that a God wished to make himself the food of his own creatures? But the Church has declared in several of her councils, and especially in the Council of Trent (Sess. 13, can. 1,) that our Redeemer Christ Jesus is really and truly present in the consecrated host. How beautiful was the reply of St. Lewis, king of France, to a person inviting him to behold Jesus Christ, who appeared in the consecrated host under the form of an infant. "Let those," said the holy king, "who do not believe by faith go and see; I believe more firmly than if I saw Jesus Christ with my eyes." And he remained where he was. Secondly, you should excite sentiments of humility by considering that, in spite of your misery, you are to receive a God into your mouth and into your heart. The venerable Paul Segneri used to say that for a person going to communion the most appropriate sentiment is one of astonishment, which would make her exclaim: What! a God to me! a God to me! What would be the sentiments of a shepherd if he saw his sovereign coming to dwell with him in his tent? What are your sentiments when you behold the King of Heaven coming into your heart in the holy communion? Will you not at least say to him with true humility: "Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst enter under my roof." To humility unite an act of contrition and of hope, confidently expecting that Jesus Christ, when he comes into your soul, will enrich you with his graces. Thirdly, you must excite an ardent desire of receiving Jesus Christ in the holy sacrament. To nourish the soul, this celestial bread must be eaten with hunger. He who receives it with the strongest desire derives from it the greatest graces. St. Francis de Sales used to say that he who gives himself to us only through love should be received only through love Our Redeemer said once to St. Matilda: "When you communicate desire to have the greatest love which the saints have had for me, and in return for this desire I will accept your love in proportion to the fervour with which you wished for it." To remember these acts it will be sufficient to say to yourself before communion: Who comes? to whom does he come? why does he come? A God of infinite majesty comes: he comes to you a miserable sinner, and he comes to be loved by you.

13. After communion remain with Jesus Christ as long as you can. Father M. Avila said that we should set great value on the time after communion, because it is a precious time for acquiring treasures of grace. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi was accustomed to say: "The time after communion is the most precious time in our life; it is the fittest time for negotiating with God, and for inflaming our souls with his divine love. At this time we have no need of masters or of books, for Jesus Christ himself teaches us how we are to love him." St. Teresa used to say: "After communion let us not lose so good an opportunity of negotiating. God does not repay with ingratitude the abode in which he is well received." In another place she says that after communion Jesus Christ remains in the soul as on a throne of grace, and appears to say to her what he said when on earth to the man that was born blind: "What wilt thou that I should do to thee?" Beloved soul, tell me what you want from me: I am come for the purpose of bestowing on you the graces you ask of me. It is the opinion of Cajetan, Suarez, Conet, Valentia, Lugo, and others, that as long as the sacramental species remain, the fruit of the sacrament and divine love are increased in proportion to the efforts of the soul to unite herself with Jesus Christ, and to the good acts which she performs. For the operation of this celestial bread in the soul is similar to that of corporal food, which gives nourishment and strength in proportion to the time it remains in the body. Many religious communicate frequently, and draw but little fruit from their communions, because they remain but a short time with Jesus Christ. To St. Margaret of Cortona our Lord once said: I treat souls as they treat me. If you are not prevented by some duty of obedience or of charity, be careful to remain with Jesus Christ at least for half an hour after communion. I say at least for half an hour: for an hour is the proper time for thanksgiving. Endeavour to employ yourself after communion in acts of recollection, of thanksgiving, of love, of sorrow, of oblation of yourself and of all you possess; but, above all, in petitions to Jesus Christ for his graces, and particularly for the gift of final perseverance and of his holy love. In these acts consists that negotiation of which St. Teresa speaks; and when you feel dryness and dissipation of mind, read a book which contains devout affections towards God. The entire day of communion should be spent in more than usual recollection. St. Lewis Gonzaga endeavoured to entertain himself for three days after communion in thanking Jesus Christ. Nor should your recollection be diminished because you communicate more frequently; on the contrary, the oftener you receive the Lord the more closely you should keep yourself united to him.

11. What shall we say of the nun, who through carelessness abstains from the holy Eucharist, though she has the opportunity of frequent communion, and has before her eyes the example of the sisters who communicate often? Let us see if her excuses be reasonable. She will say: "I do not communicate often, because I do not think myself worthy of frequent communion." My dear sister, if this excuse were satisfactory, you ought never to communicate. For St. Ambrose says: "He that is not worthy to receive daily, is not worthy to receive after a year"—Lib. 5. de Sacram. cap. 4. But who can be ever worthy of the holy communion? Jesus Christ alone, who was God and man, communicated worthily; for God alone is worthy of receiving a God. You say you do not think yourself worthy of frequent communion. But do you not know, that the longer you defer communion, the more unworthy you become? For the longer you abstain from the blessed Eucharist, the more your defects are multiplied, because you are bereft of the assistance you should receive from the holy communion. A holy Dominican nun used to say: "For my part, because I am sensible of my unworthiness, I would wish to communicate three times a day, for by more frequent communion I should hope to render myself less unworthy." Which of the two, says Cassian, is the more humble: the man who communicates often, or he that communicates but seldom? He answers, that the person who frequently receives Jesus Christ is the more humble, because he knows his infirmities, and therefore seeks more frequently the remedy of his disease. The angelic doctor says, that though to abstain from communion through humility and fear, is pleasing to God, still the love and confidence which induce a soul to receive him, are more acceptable in his sight. "However, love and hope, to which the Scripture constantly exhorts us, are preferable to fear"—3 p. q. 8, a. 10, ad. 3.

12. She will add: I do know whether I am in the state of grace. But I ask, do you expect that an angel will come from heaven to assure you that you are so? Is it not enough for you to have the assurance of your confessor? You ought to place more confidence in the testimony of the minister of God than in the revelations of all the angels; for in receiving a communication from angels, there might be an illusion, but in listening to the confessor, who, in your regard, holds the place of God, there is no danger of deception. Whenever, then, your spiritual father allows you to communicate, take care not to obey the suggestions of the devil, by abstaining from communion through fears and scruples. Be assured that their is no species of disobedience more pernicious to a soul, than to omit a communion prescribed by her confessor; for such disobedience proceeds from want of humility, or from a belief that she is a better judge than her director.

13. I cannot, you will say, bring myself to communicate often, because I constantly commit faults and never amend. To this excuse an answer has been given in paragraph 7. If your faults are fully deliberate, and if you make no effort to correct them, neither I nor any other spiritual guide will advise you to communicate often. But if you have no affection for venial sins, and do not commit them with full deliberation, if, on the contrary, you love prayer, and desire to advance in perfection, then I say to you, obey your confessor, and have no more uneasiness about your communions. The greater you perceive your infirmities to be, the more frequently you ought to seek a remedy for them in the holy communion. "Because," says St. Ambrose, "I always sin, I should always use a remedy"—L. de sacram. c. 6. We buttress walls that are inclined, not to make them erect, but to prevent their falling. You say, that you perceive in yourself no amendment: will you improve without the aid of holy communion? No: you will, on the contrary, grow worse every day. In his treatise on communion, Father Granada says, that, "he who desires to be cured of his infirmities should not abstain from this great remedy." The bare remembrance of having communicated in the morning, and the thought of having to communicate the next day, make a person more watchful and more attentive to the correction of her faults. Besides, the sacrament itself infuses an increase of light and strength into the soul. Theologians generally assert, that the holy Eucharist produces more graces than all the other sacraments, because it contains Jesus Christ himself, who is the author of grace. A present which a prince makes with his own hand, is more valuable than the gifts which he dispenses through the hands of others.

14. You will say, I feel myself distracted, cold, and without devotion. What, I ask, do you understand by devotion? If you mean sensible fervour, I say that is not necessary; it is enough to have fervour in the will, or a determination to do what you know to be pleasing to God. This is the true devotion and fervour which God demands of you; and though you do not feel this fervour of the will, you should, notwithstanding, communicate, in order to obtain it by means of the holy sacrament. For if you abstain from communion because you have not sensible fervour, you will, as Gerson says, imitate the folly of those who, when cold, refuse to approach the fire because they do not feel warm. According to St. Laurence Justinian, this sacrament sometimes produces its effect, though we do not perceive it. St. Bonaventure says: "Although you feel tepid, approach with confidence, for the greater your infirmity, the more you stand in need of a physician"—S. Bon. on Relig. Perfec. chap. 22. Do not be deterred from frequent communion because you experience more devotion when you communicate seldom than when you communicate often. He that eats but seldom eats with greater eagerness, but with less profit; and if you communicate but seldom, you may, perhaps, feel a little more of sensible fervour, but you shall also receive less fruit; because your soul will want the food which gives strength to avoid sins and imperfections. Seek not, then, sensible devotion in communion. Communicate only for the purpose of uniting your soul more closely to God, and be assured, that as often as you communicate with that view, your communions will produce great fruit.

15. I abstain from communion to escape the censure of others, who see my imperfections and rebuke me for communicating so frequently. To this pretext I answer: if you communicate with the advice of your director, and through a motive of advancing in divine love, or of correcting your defects, be not disturbed by the complaints or censure of others. I have already said, that according to Father Avila, they who censure others for frequent communion perform the office of the devil. Will you, then, pay attention to their complaints? Listen to the words of St. Francis de Sales: (Introd. chap. 21.) "If," he says, "they ask you why you communicate so often, tell them that two classes of persons should communicate frequently: the perfect, to preserve perfection; and the imperfect, to attain perfection: the strong, not to become weak; and the weak, to grow strong: the sick, to be cured; and the healthy, to prevent sickness. And as to yourself, tell them that because you are imperfect, weak, and infirm, you stand in need of frequent communion. Tell them, that all who are free from worldly occupations, because they have the opportunity, and all who are engaged in them, because they have need of communion, should communicate frequently." In conclusion, he says: "Philothea, communicate often, and as often as possible, with the advice of your spiritual father; and believe me, that as the hares on our mountains become white, because they feed only on snow, so, by eating purity itself in the sacrament, you shall become all pure." To St. Frances of Rome, as she was going to communion, the devil said: "How can you, who are so full of venial sins, dare to receive the Immaculate Lamb?" Perceiving that the enemy wished to deprive her of communion, she banished him by spitting in his face. The blessed Virgin immediately appeared to her, and after having praised her conduct, said that our defects, instead of being an obstacle, should be an incentive to communion, since in communion we find the remedy of all our miseries. The Roman catechism teaches (De Euch. p. 2, num. 52,) that venial sins are remitted by the holy communion; and the generality of divines agree with St. Thomas (3 p. q. 79, a. 4,) that the holy Eucharist excites in the soul acts of divine love, by which venial sins are pardoned.

16. You will perhaps say: "I have not time to prepare as I ought for the holy communion." I answer: if your time is spent in useless occupations or in idle discourses, then your discourse is frivolous. But if it be employed in performing the duties of your office, or of obedience, then you may rest assured that the discharge of these duties, with a view to please God, will be an excellent preparation for communion. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi was once engaged in making bread when the bell rang for communion, she instantly obeyed the call, and in an ecstasy received the holy sacrament. Hence she was accustomed to say to her sisters: "Offer to God all your actions as a preparation for communion; perform them with the intention of pleasing him, and communicate." Whenever the want of time arises from your being employed in the service of the community, in the care of the sick, or in the performance of any work of charity, which cannot be deferred, you should never abstain from communion in consequence of not having sufficient time for preparation. But be careful to avoid as much as possible all unnecessary conversations and amusements, and when you foresee that in the morning you shall not have time to prepare for communion, endeavour in the preceding evening to make some preparation by reading a book of piety, and by making the acts which ought to be made in the morning; or rise a little before the usual hour, and spend whatever time may be at your disposal in preparation for the holy sacrament.

17. My confessor, you will perhaps say, is not inclined to allow me frequent communion. If the confessor does not permit you to communicate often you must obey. But supply the want of the holy sacrament by redoubling your spiritual communions. Say to Jesus Christ: Lord, I would receive you more frequently were I not prevented by obedience. And he will be pleased with your desire of communion and with your obedience. But why do you not ask the permission of your confessor to communicate more frequently? To ask leave for more frequent communion is useful, and is by no means opposed to the perfection of obedience For in allowing more or less frequent communion confessors are regulated by the desire of communion which they perceive in their penitents. To produce great fruit, this divine food must be eaten with hunger; it fructifies but little in the souls that have not an appetite for it. You do not ask leave for communion, and therefore you show but little eagerness for the holy sacrament; hence, the confessor does not permit you to communicate often. Why do you not imitate St. Catherine of Sienna, who, when deprived of communion by her confessor, exclaimed: "Father, give my soul its food, give my soul its food." Had you, like her, manifested, with humility and resignation, this holy hunger, your confessor would have treated you in a different manner. But because he sees you cold, and not unwilling to be refused communion, he prudently abstains from advising you to communicate more frequently.

18. Oh! what great and continual progress is made in divine love by those who, with a strong desire, and with the permission of their spiritual father, frequent the holy communion. Oh! how wonderfully does the Lord draw them to his love! To keep them humble and resigned he sometimes leaves them in darkness, without any sense of their own advancement, and without any of the comforts of sensible devotion. According to St. Teresa, frequent communion is the best support of these desolate souls. Let others say what they please, it is certain that, in general, the most regular convents are those in which the holy communion is most frequented, and that in all monasteries religious who communicate most freqently are the most fervent and exemplary.

19. O my God, why are so many frivolous excuses put forward? Let the religious who seldom communicates speak the truth, and she must acknowledge that her repugnance to frequent communion arises from an unwillingness to bind herself to a life of greater retirement, and of greater detachment from creatures, and from self-indulgence. She knows well that conversations with seculars, friendships, vanity, self-esteem, and inordinate attachment to the indulgence of the appetite, and such imperfections, are not compatible with frequent communion, and therefore she abstains from it. She cannot bear to be rebuked at each communion by Jesus Christ for her disorderly life. In a word she receives him but seldom, because she wishes to live under less restraint. Are you, dear sister, animated with these sentiments? If you are, I say that since you love Jesus Christ but little, and desire but little to love him, you should not receive him frequently. But beware! this obstinate tepidity, which you can but will not correct, may one day lead you into a precipice. Ah, arise from this miserable state; give yourself to God for the remainder of your life; you know not how long it will last; it may be very short. Reform your conduct according to the best of your ability, and endeavour to communicate more frequently. When your confessor permits you, go to communion without fear or hesitation; and leave others to say of you what they please. Fear not that you will have to account, at the hour of death, for communions made with the advice of your confessor. I say, and I assure you, that at the hour of death, you will repent, not of the communions which you made with his permission, but of those which you could have made, and which, through negligence, you omitted. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi once saw a soul suffering in purgatory for having through carelessness omitted one communion. And we read in her life that she several times burst into tears because a sister abstained from communion through negligence. Be assured that of all your devotions there is none more dear to Jesus Christ than your communions. For all perfection consists in a perfect union with God: and the holy communion is the action which unites the soul most closely to him, and consequently she can do nothing more pleasing in his sight. Hence, the same St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say: "I would rather die than omit a communion permitted by obedience." I shall now speak of spiritual communion, which has been so much practiced by the saints.

On Spiritual Communion.

20. A spiritual communion, as St. Thomas says (3 p. q. 30, a. 1, ad. 3,) consists in an ardent desire of receiving Jesus Christ in the holy sacrament. The Council of Trent (Sess. 13, c. 3) extols the advantages of spiritual communion, and exhorts the faithful to practice it. And God has several times given devout souls to understand how pleasing it is to him that they receive him spiritually. Jesus Christ appeared one day to Sister Paula Maresca, foundress of the Convent of St. Catherine of Sienna in Naples, as we read in her life, and showed her two vessels, one of gold and another of silver, and said to her, that in the former he preserved her sacramental communions, and in the latter her spiritual communions. On another occasion he said to the venerable Jane of the Cross, that as often as she communicated spiritually, she received a grace similar to that she derived from her sacramental communions. Father John Nider, of the order of St. Dominick, relates (For lib. 1, c. 1) that in a certain city a man of great virtue desired to communicate often, but because the practice of frequent communion did not exist in the place, he, to avoid singularity, contented himself with spiritual communion. Hence, he would first go to confession and make his meditation; he would then assist at mass and prepare for communion, and would open his mouth as if he were receiving Jesus Christ. The author relates, that in opening his mouth, the man used to feel the particle laid on his tongue, and his soul filled with sweetness. One morning he put his finger into his mouth, to try if the consecrated particle were really placed on his tongue; the sacred host adhered to his finger; he placed it again in his mouth, and received it. Thus the Lord rewarded the desire of this good servant.

21. Father Peter Faber, of the Society of Jesus, used to say that spiritual communions are a powerful help to receive the holy Eucharist with the proper dispositions. Hence, the saints have been in the habit of making frequent spiritual communions. Blessed Angela of the Cross, a Dominican nun, went so far as to say: "If my confessor had not taught me this method of communicating I could scarcely live." Hence, she used to make a hundred spiritual communions every day, and a hundred more every night. But how, you will ask, could she make so many? St. Augustine answers: "Give me a lover, and he understands what I say"—Trac. 26, in Joan. Give me a soul that loves only Jesus Christ, and she will not wonder at it. It is most easy to make several spiritual communions in the day; it is not necessary to be fasting, to have a priest, or to spend a long time. Hence, we may make a spiritual communion as often as we please. Hence, the venerable Jane of the Cross used to say: O my Lord, how excellent a mode of communicating! without being seen or remarked: without giving trouble to my spiritual father, or depending on any one but thee, who in solitude dost nourish my soul and speak to my heart.

22. Be careful, then, to make frequent spiritual communions in your meditations, visits to the blessed sacrament, and be particularly careful, as often as you hear mass, to make a spiritual communion during the communion of the priest. Make an act of faith, believing firmly that Jesus Christ is present in the holy sacrament, an act of love, uniting with it an act of sorrow for your sins; and then an act of desire, inviting Jesus Christ to come into your soul, in order to make it entirely his own; and in the end thank him, as if you had received him. You can make these acts in the following manner: My Jesus, I believe that thou art truly and really present in the holy sacrament. I love thee with my whole heart, and because I love thee, I am sorry for having offended thee. I embrace thee, O my love, and I give myself entirely to thee; do not permit me ever to be separated from thee. In this manner you can make as many spiritual communions as you please.

On the Visitation of the Most Holy Sacrament.

23. The frequent visitation of Jesus Christ in the sacrament of the altar is a great help to the souls that love him. The holy Church has instituted and celebrates the festival of the adorable sacrament with so many solemnities, in honour not only of the holy communion, but also of the loving dwelling of Jesus Christ night and day in our churches, in this sacrament of love. Our loving Lord, says Nierembergh, has left himself on earth under the species of bread, principally in order to be the food of our souls; but he has left himself also in order to remain with us shut up in our tabernacles, and thus remind us of the love which he bears us. "No tongue," says St. Peter of Alcantara, "can express the greatness of the love which Jesus bears to all who are in the state of grace." Hence, that his absence from them might not be an occasion of forgetting him, this most sweet spouse, before his departure from this world, left, as a memorial of his love, this most holy sacrament, in which he himself remained. He did not wish that between him and his servants there should be any other pledge than himself to keep alive the remembrance of him.

24. Hence, when our dear Saviour left this world, he did not wish to leave us alone, and therefore he devised a means of remaining with us in the holy Eucharist to the end of time, that even here below we might enjoy his sweet company. This he declared to his disciples, and through them to us all. "Behold, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world"—Matt. xxviii. 20. Hence St.

Peter of Alcantara adds: "The Saviour did not wish to leave his spouse alone at such a distance, and therefore he has left her this sacrament, in which he himself remains as the best companion he could leave her."

25. St. Teresa says that all are not permitted to speak to the king: the most that a vassal can expect is to speak to his sovereign through a third person. She then adds: But to speak to thee, O King of Glory, the intervention of a third person is not necessary; thou art always ready to give audience to all in the sacrament of the altar. Every one that wishes may find thee there always, and may speak to thee with confidence. Oh! how difficult is it to obtain an audience from an earthly monarch! Kings seldom give audience to their subjects. But thou, O my Redeemer, in this sacrament, dost give audience to all, whenever they wish. Our divine King, says the same Saint, in order to animate us to approach his feet with greater confidence, has clothed himself with the species of bread in this sacrament, and thus veiled his majesty, that we may not be terrified at the sight of it. But, O God! how many insults must Jesus Christ have suffered from infidels, from heretics, and from sinners in this sacrament, in order to remain with us. Some have trampled on the sacred host, others have thrown it into the mire. He foresaw all these injuries; but still he resolved to remain with us on the altar, that we might not be deprived of his amiable presence. Many pilgrims make long journeys to visit the holy house in Loretto, where Jesus Christ once dwelt, or to venerate the places in the Holy Land, in which he was born, in which he suffered and died. But Father John Avila had just reason to say that he knew no sanctuary more amiable, or better calculated to inspire devotion, than a church in which the holy sacrament is preserved, for there Jesus Christ has not only once dwelt and suffered, but truly lives and dwells. Hence the saints have experienced no greater delight on earth than that which they enjoyed in the presence of the most holy sacrament. St. Francis Xavier, as is related in his life (lib. 6, c. 5,) after having laboured all day for the sanctification of souls, spent the night at the foot of the tabernacle; when overcome by sleep he threw himself on the steps of the altar, and after a short repose he began again to converse with his dear Lord. St. John Francis Regis used to do the same after having spent the entire day in preaching and hearing confessions: his repose consisted in remaining during the night before Jesus in the holy sacrament, and when he found the church shut he remained outside the door, to pay homage, at least at a distance, to his beloved Redeemer. The venerable Father Balthassar Alvarez, a holy man, when unable to remain in the church, endeavoured, at least, to keep his eyes turned to the tabernacle in which he knew the holy sacrament was preserved. In a word, all the saints have found their paradise on earth in this sacrament. St. Teresa said one day from heaven to one of her religious: "We who rejoice in heaven, and you who suffer on earth, should be the same in purity and love. And what we do in heaven, before the divine Essence, you should do on earth, before the most holy sacrament"—Riv. lib. 3. c. And what greater paradise can a soul that loves Jesus Christ find on this earth, than to remain at his feet, to manifest the love she bears him, to offer to him herself and all that belongs to her, to make known her desires, to see him face to face, in order to love him with greater ardour?

26. But this paradise religious can enjoy in a special manner. It is true that Jesus remains in the holy sacrament for all; but he remains particularly for nuns—his spouses, who enjoy his society day and night within their own very house. When Jesus was born the holy Magi left their country and their homes, and spent a long time travelling through Palestine inquiring for the birthplace of the Redeemer: "Saying, where is he that is born King of the Jews?"—Matt. ii. To visit Jesus Christ, seculars must leave their houses and go to the church, which is closed at night, and in many places is open only in the morning. But a nun need not leave her own dwelling in order to enjoy the society of Jesus Christ: he remains continually in the house in which she dwells. A nun, then, can visit him whenever she pleases, in the morning or evening, by day or by night. She, as a spouse, is permitted to dwell in the palace. How highly honoured does the vassal esteem himself to be when he is invited to dwell in the palace of the king. You, then, O blessed sister, are one of these happy Christians who have the honour of dwelling on this earth with Jesus Christ, the king of heaven. You can visit him and remain with him, whenever you please. The venerable Mother Mary of Jesus, the foundress of a monastery in Toulouse, used to say that she thanked God in a special manner for two things; first, because by the vow of obedience, religious belong entirely to God; secondly, because they have the happiness of dwelling with Jesus Christ in the blessed sacrament. In other churches Jesus Christ remains for all; but in your monastery he dwells only for you and your companions. Be careful to profit of his presence. O God! in all the monasteries the nuns should, like so many butterflies, hover night and day about their Spouse; their hearts should remain with him to burn continually and with greater splendour than the lights and lamps at the altar.

27. But, alas! of the ingratitude of men for his loving dwelling among them, our Lord complained to his servant, Sister Margaret Alacoque, to whom he showed, one day, his heart burning with love for men, and said to her: "Behold that heart, which has loved men so tenderly, has reserved nothing, but has consumed itself in order to show its love for them. But in return I receive nothing but ingratitude and contempt from the greater number in this sacrament. But what displeases me most is that some of these ungrateful hearts are hearts consecrated to me." In these last words he spoke of the religious who set little value on their happy lot of dwelling in the same house with Jesus Christ, and therefore draw but little profit from his society. If he were to come into your church once a year, and to remain only for a single day, surely all would contend with each other in paying homage to him, and remaining in his loving company; and will you leave him alone and visit him so seldom, because, in order to see you more frequently in his presence, he in his goodness remains continually with you?

28. If you have hitherto been negligent in visiting Jesus in the tabernacle, I advise you, henceforth, to avail yourself of the great treasure which you have in the most holy sacrament. Sister Anne of the Cross, who had been countess of Feria, and a Spanish lady of high rank, after being a widow for twenty-four years, became a nun of the order of St. Clare, in Montiglia: she procured a cell, from which she had a view of the altar of the blessed sacrament, and there she generally remained day and night. Being asked how she was employed during so many hours which she spent before the sacrament, she replied: I would remain there for all eternity. How am I employed before Jesus in the blessed Eucharist? I thank him, I love him, and I ask his graces." Behold an excellent means of drawing great fruit from your visits to the blessed sacrament. First, thank Jesus Christ. O God, how thankful is a nun to a relative who comes from a distance to visit her. And will you not thank Jesus Christ who descends from heaven, not only to visit you, but also to remain always with you? First of all, in your visit, enliven your faith and adore your spouse in the sacrament: thank his great goodness in coming to remain on the altar for the love of you. Secondly, love him. St. Philip Neri, when he saw the most holy viaticum brought into his room, was all on fire with holy love, and exclaimed: behold my love! behold my love! Do you say the same when you remain before the holy tabernacle. Consider that your spouse, shut up in that prison of love, is burning with love for you. To St. Catherine of Sienna he appeared one day in the sacrament, in the form of a fiery furnace, and the saint was astonished that the flames which issued from it had not filled the hearts of all men with divine love. If, when you remain in his presence, you wish to please him, repeat acts of love, offering to him yourself in a special manner. Thirdly, ask his grace. Blessed Henry Suson used to say that it is in the holy sacrament that Jesus hears most readily the prayers of those who visit him, and dispenses his graces most abundantly. The venerable Father Balthassar Alvarez once saw Jesus Christ in the sacrament with his hands full of graces, but found no one to whom he could impart them, because there was no one to ask them. You say that you cannot remain in the presence of Jesus Christ because you know not what to do before him, nor what to say to him. O God, and why do you not employ yourself in asking the graces you stand in need of? Beg of him to give you strength to resist temptations, to correct the faults into which you always relapse, to rescue you from the passion which keeps you in chains, and hinders you to give yourself entirely to God. Entreat him to give you aid to suffer all insults and contradictions in peace, to increase in your heart his divine love, and entreat him particularly to make you live always united to his holy will. When you feel disturbed on account of having committed any fault, go instantly to the holy sacrament to ask pardon, and then calm your mind. When you receive any offence, or when you meet a heavy cross, go and offer it to Jesus Christ, and ask his aid to embrace it with resignation. Oh! if all religious acted in this manner, and knew how to avail themselves of the society of their spouse, they would all become saints. Let it be your care to become a saint by adopting this practice.

PRAYER.

I adore thee, O my Jesus, in the most holy sacrament of the altar. Thou didst once sacrifice thy divine life on a cross for my sake: and now, because thou lovest me, thou dost remain shut up in this tabernacle as a prison of love. From among so many young persons who have offended thee less than I have, thou hast, after I had committed so many sins, chosen me to live with thee in thy own house: taking me from the world, and rescuing me from its dangers, thou hast admitted me into this convent, that I might always remain in thy company on this earth, that I might one day love and enjoy thee face to face in heaven, and become thy eternal spouse and companion in the kingdom of thy glory. Here thou dost even invite me frequently to eat thy sacred flesh in the holy communion, that I may be entirely united to thee, and that I may become all thine. My dear Redeemer, what can I say? I thank thee for this great favour, and I hope one day to thank thee for it in heaven for all eternity. I will say with St. Teresa: the mercies of the Lord I will sing for ever. Yes, my Jesus, my love, and my spouse, this I expect through thy merits. I now declare that I feel more content at having left, for the love of thee, the world and the little pleasures which I could there enjoy, than if I were queen of all the earth. I am sorry for having hitherto, even in thy own house, given thee so much displeasure, for which I would deserve to be banished from it. My Jesus, pardon me, and for thy mercy's sake grant that, among so many of my good sisters, who have served thee so well, I, too, a poor sinner, may serve thee. I do not wish ever more to depart from thy feet, I wish to visit thee frequently. Thy presence will give me strength to banish every affection which is not for thee; it will remind me of my obligation to love thee, and to have recourse to thee in all my necessities. I wish to remain always near thee, and I wish to communicate often in order to love thee more ardently, and to be united with thee, my beloved Lord. I love thee, O God, concealed in the most holy sacrament. For the love of me, thou dost remain continually on this altar, and for the love of thee I wish to remain as much as possible in thy society. Shut up in this tabernacle, thou dost always love me; and shut up in this convent, I will always love thee. Then, my Jesus, and my all, we shall remain always together, as I hope, for time in this house, and for eternity in paradise. O Mary, my mother, pray to Jesus for me, and obtain for me a great love for the most holy sacrament. Amen.

CHAPTER XIX.

On Purity of Intention.

1. Purity of intention consists in performing all our actions through the sole motive of pleasing God. It is necessary to know that the good or bad intention with which an act is performed makes the act good or bad in the sight of God. "If," said our Lord, "thy eye be single, thy whole body shall be lightsome. But if thy eye be evil, thy whole body shall be darksome"—Matt. vi. 22, 23. By the eye the holy fathers understand the intention, and by the body they understand the action. Hence, Jesus Christ tells us, that if our intention be simple, that is, if we have no other object than to please him, our works are good and resplendent with the light of purity: but if our intention be two-fold, that is, if any vicious end enters into our actions, they are sinful. Holy simplicity admits no other end than the pleasure of God. Hence, a pure intention is the soul of our actions; it gives them life, and makes them pleasing in the eyes of God. In the estimation of men the value of an act increases in proportion to the time spent in its performance; but before God the value of an act increases in proportion to the purity of intention with which it is performed. For, as the Scripture says, men look only to the external acts, but God regards the heart; that is, the will with which they are performed. "For man seeth those things that appear, but the Lord beholdeth the heart"—1 Kings xvi. Can there be any action more excellent than to suffer martyrdom and give one's life for the faith? But St. Paul says: "If I should deliver my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing" —1 Cor. xiii. 3. Though I should give my body to the flames, unless I give it for God, it profits me nothing. No: for, as the holy fathers say, it is neither torments nor death, but the cause and intention, that make a martyr. "Martyrem non facit pœna, sed causa."

2. Hence, the Royal Prophet said: "I will offer up to thee holocausts full of marrow"—Ps. lxv. 15. Some offer to God sacrifices without marrow, that is, without a pure intention of pleasing him; such oblations God does not accept. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that God rewards our actions in proportion to the purity of our intention of pleasing him. Hence, St. Augustine has written: "Non valde attentas, quid homo faciat: sed quid dum facit, aspiciat." Attend not to what a man does, but to the motive of his conduct: for, adds St. Ambrose, the good which you will do shall be proportioned to the purity of intention with which you do it for the divine glory. "Tantum facis quantum intendis." "Who is she," says the Holy Ghost, "that goeth up by the desert, as a pillar of smoke of aromatical spices, of myrrh, and frankincense, and of all the powders of the perfumer"—Cant. iii. 6. Myrrh signifies mortification; frankincense, prayer; and the powders of the perfumer represent all other virtues. But the spouse is praised for all; because all her virtues form a pillar of odoriferous smoke, which ascends to God—that is, all her actions have no other end than to please her divine spouse.

3. We have in the Gospels two great proofs and examples of the great value of a good intention before God. The first example is related by St. Luke (viii. 43.) Whilst our Redeemer travelled through the cities and towns preaching the kingdom of God, he was one day accompanied by a great crowd: "a woman having an issue of blood" made her way through the throng until she succeeded in touching the hem of his garment. He asked: "Who is it that touched me?" Surprised at the question, the disciples answered: "Master, the multitude throng and press thee, and dost thou say who touched me?" But our Lord meant not the material touch, but the faith and devotion with which the woman had touched his garment. Hence, St. Augustine has written: "Tangit Christum fides paucorum premit eum turba multorum"—De Verb. Dom. Serm. 8. Many press round Jesus Christ, but few touch him. Many nuns submit to great labour through the monastery, in order to increase the revenues of the convent, in order to celebrate their festivals with great pomp, and perform many actions which appear to be great; but because their intention is not pure, they press round Jesus Christ, but do not touch him: hence, they annoy rather than please him. The other example is that of the poor widow who put her two mites into the treasury of the temple, into which others had cast large sums. But of her the Saviour said: "Amen, I say to you, this poor widow hath cast in more than all they who have cast into the treasury"—Mark xii. 43. In his exposition of this passage, St. Cyprian says, that by these words our Lord meant that he regards not so much the action which is performed as the affection and purity of the intention with which it is performed: "Considerans non quantum sed ex quanto dedisset"—D. S. Cypr. de Op. et Elem.

4. Let us come to what is practical. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say to her novices: Never seek yourselves in any of your exercises. A religious who seeks herself in her actions, by performing them in order to be praised or to please herself, imitates the man who puts the wages he receives for his labour into a bag with holes. "He," says the prophet Aggeus, "that hath earned wages put them into a bag with holes"—i. 6. That is, she loses all her works. Hence, our Lord says to all, "Take heed that you do not your justice before men, to be seen by them"—Matt. vi. Be careful, he says, not to act through the sole motive of being seen and praised by men: if you do, when you ask a reward from me, I will answer: "Recipisti mercedem tuam;" you have received your reward, you have obtained the praise which you sought; what can you now expect from me? In the life of St. Panchomius, Surius relates that a certain monk made two mats whilst his companions made but one; he showed the two mats to the saint in order to receive praise, but the saint said to the other monks: "This monk has worked till night, and has offered his work to the devil."

5. But let us examine the marks by which you may know whether your works have been truly done for God. The first mark is if, when your undertaking has not been successful, you are not disturbed, but remain as tranquil as if you had attained your object. This will certainly be the case when you have acted only for God; because when you see that he has not wished your efforts to be crowned with success, neither will you wish it; for you know that he demands an account, not of the success or failure of your undertaking, but of the purity of your intention. The second mark is, to rejoice at the good done by others as if it had been done by yourself. He who seeks nothing but the divine glory cares not whether it is promoted by another or by himself. The third mark is, not to desire one office more than another, one occupation more than another, but to be content with whatever is prescribed by obedience; because in everything you then seek nothing but the pleas ure of God. The fourth sign is, in your good works not to desire approbation nor thanks, but to remain, even when censured and maltreated, in the same tranquillity of mind, satisfied at having succeeded in pleasing God, which was your sole object.

6. And should it ever happen that any of your actions are greatly praised by others, and that you are tempted to vain-glory, and to take complacency in the praises bestowed upon you, you need not annoy yourself by endeavouring to banish the temptation by contrary acts; it is better to pay no attention to the evil suggestion, and in conformity with the advice of Father John Avila, to say: "You have come too late, for I have already given my work to God." When you perform any act of virtue, such as when you observe rule with exactness, when you remain in the choir to pray, or retire to your cell, or do an act of mortification, or assist the lay sisters in their work, or perform acts of similar edification in order to give good example to others, do not, through the fear of being seen and praised, abstain from such acts as long as you do all for God. The Lord wishes that others should see our good works, that thus they may be induced to imitate them, and give glory to God. "So let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven"—Matt. v. 16. All consists in doing our actions with an upright intention. Should vain-glory assail us, let us say with St. Bernard, who, when tempted to vanity in the act of preaching, said: "Non propter te cœpi, nec propter te desinam." I have not commenced my sermon for you; neither shall I, through fear of you, abstain from finishing it; in preaching I have sought only to please God. St. Francis Xavier used to say, that a person who has deserved hell by his sins, should regard the praises of men as insults and mockery. St. Teresa says: "When we seek to please God alone, the Lord will give us strength to conquer all vain-glory."

7. Our intention may be good in three ways; first, when we perform an act in order to obtain from God temporal goods; when, for example, a person gives alms, procures masses to be offered, or fasts in order to be delivered from any infirmity, calumny, or other temporal affliction. This intention is good, provided it is accompanied with resignation to the divine will; but it is the least perfect because the object is earthly. Secondly, when we do an act in order to make satisfaction to the divine justice for the pains due to our sins, or to obtain from God spiritual goods, such as virtue, or an increase of merits and of glory in heaven; this intention is far more perfect than the former. But the most perfect of all is when, in our works, we seek only to please God and to do his holy will. This intention is also the most meritorious: for the more we forget ourselves in our good actions, the more God will remember us, and the more abundantly he will pour his graces upon us, as he himself once said to St. Catherine of Sienna: "my daughter, think of me, and I will think of you." He meant to say, think only of pleasing me, and I will take care of your progress in virtue, of your victories over your enemies, of your perfection, and of your glory in heaven. This is what the sacred spouse meant, when she said: "I to my beloved, and his turning is towards me"—Cant. vii. 10.

8. Oh! that you had the spirit of that holy woman, who was seen by a religious of the order of St. Dominick, when travelling to Palestine, along with St. Lewis, king of France. In one hand she carried a vessel of water and in the other a lighted torch. Being asked by the religious why she carried them, she replied, with this water I would wish to extinguish hell, and with this torch I would wish to burn heaven, that all might serve God, not through fear of hell nor hope of heaven, but only through love, in order to please him. To act from such a motive is to imitate the love of the saints in bliss, who seek nothing but the pleasure of God; for, as St. Thomas says (Opusc. 63,) they rejoice more in the felicity of God than in their own. It is to enter into the joy of the Lord, into which each of the blessed is invited when he enters heaven: "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord"—Matt. xxvi. 21. Hence, says St. Bernard, a soul acts with a perfect motive when she acts, not that she may be pleasing to God, but because the actions which she performs are pleasing to him; when she is so forgetful of herself that she acts, not that God may be pleased with her, but only that her acts may be agreeable to him. Hence, the saint used to say: "May I love thee on account of thyself." Lord, grant that I may love you, not to please myself, but only to gratify you and to do your will.

9. St. Francis de Sales used to say: "The spouse that loves Jesus Christ does not purify herself in order to be pure; she does not adorn herself in order to be beautiful, but only to please her spouse." The confidence which she feels in the goodness of her lover frees her from all solicitude and fear of not being sufficiently beautiful, and makes her satisfied with a calm and faithful preparation, proceeding from a good heart. Let us imitate the divine Saviour, who said: "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." When nothing remains but to die the death of love, living no longer to ourselves, but procuring that Jesus Christ may live in us, by saying: Let this be done, O Lord, because it is pleasing to thee. And here, let it be observed, that it is better and safer to act through a motive of doing the will of God, than with the intention of promoting his glory, because we shall thus escape all the delusions of self-love. Under the pretence of seeking the glory of God we often do our own will; but on the other hand, when we endeavour to do the divine will, and what is most pleasing to God, we can never err. And let us be persuaded that the greatest glory we can give to God consists in doing his will. It was thus our Saviour always acted, doing, as he several times declared, all things in order to do the will of his eternal Father: "I seek not my own will, but the will of him that sent me"—John v. 30. In another place he says: "I do always the things that please him"—John viii. 29. Hence, of Jesus it was justly said, that he had done all things well: "Bene omnia fecit"—Marc, vii. 37. And, says St. John Chrysostom, if we imitate his example, and succeed in pleasing God, what else need we seek? "Si dignus fueris agere aliquid, quod Deo placet aliam præter id mercedem requiris?"—Lib. de Comp. If you have been worthy of doing anything pleasing to God, what better reward do you require? Does it appear to you a small thing that you, a miserable creature, should be able to give pleasure to God?

10. Let us be persuaded that the Lord does not demand of us great things, but only that we present to him the little we do with a pure intention. "Si non habet arca quod donet," says St. Augustine, "habet cor et voluntas"—in Ps. ciii. If, because you are poor, you have nothing to give to God, your will affords much to give him, if you offer him what you do through the sole motive of pleasing him. To every soul the Lord says: "Put me as a seal upon thy heart, as a seal upon thy arm"—Cant. viii. If you wish to please me, put me as a seal upon your heart and upon your arm; that is, make my pleasure the sole end of all your desires and of all your actions. The Lord goes so far as to say, that a soul that acts for the sole end of pleasing him, becomes his sister and his spouse, and wounds his heart with the wound of love, so that he cannot but love her. "Thou hast wounded my heart, my sister, my spouse; thou hast wounded my heart with one of thy eyes"—Cant. iv. 9. By one of her eyes is signified the sole object of the soul to do the divine will in all her exercises; in making meditation only to please God, in going to communion only to give pleasure to God, obeying superiors only to obey God, recognizing God in them, as the Apostle says: "Serving as to the Lord, and not to men"—Ephes. vi. 7. Thus, she does all her actions in order to give glory to God, fulfilling the advice of the same Apostle: "Therefore, whether you eat or drink, or whatsoever else you do, do all to the glory of God"—1 Cor. x. 31. The venerable Beatrix, of the Incarnation, once a spiritual child of St. Teresa, used to say: "No price can be an equivalent for the smallest action done for God." She had just reason to say so, for all actions performed to please God are acts of divine love, which deserve an eternal reward. Hence, Father Rodriguez has written, that purity of intention is a celestial alchymy, which changes iron into gold; that is, it converts into the gold of holy charity the meanest works, such as eating, sleeping, working, or recreation. Hence, St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi was of opinion that the person who performed all his actions with a pure intention, would go straight to heaven.

11. Be careful, O blessed spouse of the Lord, from the moment you awake in the morning to direct all the actions of the day to God, offering them in union with the actions which our Saviour performed during his mortal life; thus your works will be more acceptable to God. Endeavour to renew your intention at the beginning of every action, at least at the beginning of the principal actions, such as your meditations, communions, hearing mass, work, meals, and recreation; saying always, at least mentally: "Lord, in this action I intend not my own pleasure, but the accomplishment of your will." A holy hermit, as Sangiure relates (Erar. ec. tom. 4, cap. 4,) was accustomed to raise his eyes to heaven, and to remain in that posture for a little time before he commenced any action. Being asked why he did so, he said: I am endeavouring to direct my aim. He meant to say, that as the archer looks towards the mark in order to direct the arrow, so it is necessary to raise our eyes to God, that all our actions may be holy. In the course of our employments it is advisable to renew from time to time our intention of pleasing God. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, when she saw a novice employed at any work, would say to her: "Sister, for what end do you perform that action?" And if the novice did not instantly answer that she did it for God, the Saint would reprove her. Should you find yourself engaged in occupations prescribed by obedience, be not uneasy because you cannot spend that time in prayer as you would wish. Father Balthassar Alvarez, being one day very much occupied, and desiring to finish his business in order to go to prayer, heard our Lord say: "Although you are not with me, let it be sufficient for you to be employed for me."

12. The days of them who do all their actions for God shall, as the Psalmist has said, be full days: "And full days shall be found in them"—Ps. lxxii. 10. By the full days he meant days which are entirely employed in pleasing God. On the other hand, days which are not spent for God, are empty days. Hence, the Psalmist says, that the wicked do not live half their days: "Bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days"—Ps. liv. 24. A holy religious Franciscan, as we read in the Chronicles (part 3, lib. 8, cap. 2,) being asked how long he was a religious, answered: "Ah! unhappy me, I have worn this holy habit for seventy-five years, but I know not how long I have been religious, not in name, but in truth; I cannot say that I have been a true religious even for a single moment." Would to God that what he said through humility might not be said with truth by some who have been more than thirty years in religion, and have not as yet begun to be religious. Hence, St. Eusebius said: "Illum diem vixisse te computa, qui puritatis habuit lucem"—Hom. ad Monach. Consider that you have lived only for the days on which your actions have had the light of purity; that is, on which your actions have been performed through the sole motive of pleasing God. Examine your conduct, then, O blessed sister, and see how many of your actions are really pure, are done solely for God, and free from all self-love; and should you find that hitherto they have not been pure, endeavour henceforward to perform them through the sole motive of pleasing God, and thus you shall have the happiness of hearing from the Lord on the day of your death: "Well done, good and faithful servant; because thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will place thee over many things, enter thou into the joy of the Lord"—Matt. xxv. 93. Rejoice, my good servant; because you have been faithful in a few things, by performing your works through the sole motive of pleasing me, I will give you many and great rewards.

PRAYER.

O my Jesus, when shall I cease to be ungrateful to thee? When shall I begin to love thee with a true love? O infinite Goodness, so unknown and despised in this world! I am sorry that I have been among the number of ungrateful souls. But I do not wish to die among them. Lord, assist me; make me thine before I die. Give me thy love —a fervent love, which will make me forget all creatures to remember thee alone; a strong love, which will make me conquer all difficulties, when there is question of giving pleasure to thee; a perpetual love, which shall never more be dissolved between me and thee. I love thee, dear Redeemer; and I hope for every grace through the blood thou hast shed for me. I hope for all things from thy intercession also, O Mary, my refuge, my mother, and my hope. Amen.

CHAPTER XX.

On the prayer of petition.

1. I HAVE several times treated of prayer (that is, of the prayer of petition) in my other spiritual works: in a little treatise at the end of the volume which contains the Visits to the Most Holy Sacrament, in the preparation for death, and especially in a book which I have written on prayer, entitled The Great Means of Prayer, where I have spoken of the necessity of prayer for all, in order to obtain salvation. Hence, in this place, I will only collect the principal reflections on prayer. We shall see, in the first place, the necessity of prayer; in the second place, its efficacy before God to obtain every grace; and in the third place, we shall treat of the manner in which we must pray.

2. First, with regard to the necessity of prayer: it is necessary to be persuaded that we cannot perform any good action without the actual graces of God. But the Lord declares that these graces he gives only to them who ask them of him: "Ask, and it shall be given you"—Matt. vii. 7. He, then, says St. Teresa, who does not ask shall not receive. For adults prayer is necessary, as a matter of strict precept. "We ought," says Jesus Christ, "always to pray"—Luke xviii. 1. "Pray lest you enter into temptation"—Luke xxii. 40. "Ask, and you shall receive"—John xvi. 24. The words we ought, pray, ask, according to St. Thomas and the generality of theologians, imply a strict precept which binds under pain of grievous sin. "Every man," said the angelic doctor, "is bound to pray, because he is bound to procure spiritual goods, which cannot be obtained unless they are asked"—In 4 Sent. Dist. 15, a. 1, qu. 3. A person is obliged to pray, particularly in three cases: first, when he finds himself in a state of sin; secondly, when he is in danger of death; thirdly, when he is assailed by violent temptation. Theologians teach that ordinarily he who neglects prayer for a month, or at most for two months, is guilty of a mortal sin.—See Lessius de Jus. et Jure. 2, cap. 37, n. 9. Prayer is necessary, not only as a matter of strict precept, but, according to St. Basil, St. Augustine, St. John Chrysostom, Clement of Alexandria, and others; it is also necessary as a means of salvation, without which it is impossible to preserve ourselves in the grace of God and to be saved. "Simpliciter impossible est," says St. John Chrysostom, "absque deprecationis præsidio cum virtute degere"—Lib. 1, de Orando Deum. Hence, Lessius concludes that it must be held as of faith that prayer is necessary for adults, as appears from the Scriptures.—Loc. cit.

3. The angelic doctor teaches the same: "After baptism," he says, "continual prayer is necessary for man, in order to enter heaven"—3, p. q. 39, a. 5. Because, adds the saint, though sins are cancelled by baptism, we still have temptations to conquer, which we shall not have strength to overcome without prayer. Hence, he says, in another place: "After a person is justified by grace, he requires to ask of God the gift of perseverance, that he may be preserved from evil to the end of life"—1, 2, q. 109, a 10. To understand the reason of this doctrine, it is necessary to know, first, that without a special aid from God, we cannot continue for a long time in his grace, without falling into mortal sin. For we have so many enemies who continually combat against us, and we are at the same time so weak, that if God does not assist us with special helps, or if he gives only the common graces given to all, we shall not have strength to resist. This is even a dogma of faith, defined by the Council of Trent in the following words: "If any one shall say, that a person who has been justified can, without special aid from God, persevere in the justice which he has received, or cannot persevere without such aid, let him be anathema"—Sess. 6. de Just. can. 12. It is necessary to know, secondly, that this special aid to persevere in grace (at least, ordinarily speaking) is given only to those who ask it. "It is evident," says St. Augustine, "that God gives only to those who do not pray, some gifts, such as the beginning of faith; and that he prepares other graces such as perseverance to the end, only for those who ask them"—De dono. persev. cap. 16. In a word, the holy doctor says, that except the first graces, such as vocation to the faith, or to repentance, all other graces, and particularly perseverance, God gives only to him who prays for them.

4. Let us, then, from all that has been said, infer the strict necessity of prayer for the attainment of salvation. All the reprobate have been damned in consequence of their neglect of prayer; had they prayed, they should not be lost; and all the saints have become saints by prayer; had they neglected prayer, they would not have become saints, and should not be saved. "Persuasum habeamus," says St. Chrysostom, "quod animæ mors sit non provolvi ad Dei genua"—Lib. 1, de op. Dierum. We must live with the persuasion, that to neglect prayer, and to lose the life of the soul, or the grace of God, are one and the same thing. The ancient fathers held a conference to determine what exercise is most necessary for a Christian in order to obtain salvation, and they came to the conclusion that it consists in continually repeating the prayer of David: "Incline unto my aid, O God; O Lord, make haste to help me." Lord, assist me, and hasten to my aid, for if thou delay thy assistance, I shall fall and lose thy grace. If we do this we shall be certainly saved: if we neglect to do it, we shall be certainly lost.

5. In the second place, it is necessary to examine the efficacy of prayer. Theodoret says that prayer is one, but can obtain all blessings. Prayer, though one, can do all things. He who prays obtains whatsoever he wishes. And in this it appears to me, that God displays the immense love which he bears us, and his ardent desire to promote our welfare. What greater love can a person show to a friend than to say to him—friend, ask what you wish from me, and I will grant your petition. This, God says to each of us: "Ask, and it shall be given to you"—Luke xi. 9. He makes no exception: "You shall ask whatever you will, and it shall be done unto you"—John xv. 7. He tells us to ask whatsoever we desire, and promises that our prayer shall be heard. St. Hilary asserts that prayer is so powerful before God, that it, as it were, constrains him to give us all the graces we ask. "Oratio pia Deo vim infert"—Devout prayer does violence to God. We are, as David says, poor mendicants: "But I am a beggar and poor"—Ps. xxxix. 18. But to be rich depends on ourselves: let us ask graces of God, and they shall be given us: let us ask them frequently, and they shall be poured upon us abundantly. David blessed the Lord in a special manner for his goodness in always uniting his mercy to our prayers. "Blessed be God, who hath not turned away my prayer, nor his mercy from me"—Ps. lxv. 20. St. Augustine explains this passage in these words: "When you see that your prayer has not been turned away, be assured that the mercy of God is not turned away from you." When you see that you pray, be certain that the divine mercy will not fail to assist you. And St. John Chrysostom says, that when we pray, the Lord hears us before the conclusion of our prayer: "Semper obtinetur etiam dum aduc oramus." For this we have even God's own promise. "As they are yet speaking I will hear"—Isaias lxv. 24.

6. Let us, in the third place, examine what is of the greatest importance, the conditions with which it is necessary to pray. It is necessary, in the first place, to pray with humility. "God," says St. James, "resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble"—iv. 6. God rejects the prayers of the proud, and does not listen to them; their pride is a wall which hinders the Lord to hear their petitions. But, on the other hand, Ecclesiasticus says, that "the prayer of him that humbleth himself shall pierce the clouds . . . . . and he will not depart till the Most High behold"—xxxv. 21. The prayer of an humble soul, that esteems herself unworthy of being heard, penetrates the heavens, and is presented at the throne of God; and she departs not till God beholds and hears her petitions. When, therefore, we ask the divine graces, we must first give a glance at our own unworthiness, particularly at the frequent infidelities into which, because we trusted too much in our own strength we have fallen, after so many resolutions and promises. And full of diffidence in ourselves, we should pray, and implore of the divine mercy the aid which we stand in need of.

7. Secondly, it is necessary to pray with confidence. Ecclesiasticus says, that no one has ever trusted in the Lord and has been confounded, or not heard.—ii. 11. We should, as St. James says, pray without wavering, and with a secure confidence of being heard. "Let him ask in faith, nothing wavering"—i. 6. The apostle adds: "For he that wavereth, is like a wave of the sea, which is moved and carried about by the wind. Therefore, let not that man think that he shall receive anything of the Lord"—Loc. cit. id. He says, that the man who prays with a doubt of being heard, being tossed like a wave of the sea, encouraged by one thought and disheartened by another, shall receive nothing from the Lord. We must, then, trust in the divine mercy, and believe that if we pray we shall certainly receive the graces we ask; our prayer then shall be certainly heard, and, as our Saviour assures us, the object of our petitions shall certainly be granted. "All things whatsoever you ask, when ye pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come unto you"—Mark xi. 24. But, says St. Augustine, how can we fear that our prayers shall not be heard, when God (who is truth itself) has promised to hear all who pray to him. "Quis falli metuat dum promissit veritas?"—Lib. 22, de Civ. Dei. c. 8. In another place the saint asks, how can that God who so frequently exhorts us in the Scriptures to pray for his graces, refuse what we ask of him? "Hortatur ut petas, negabit quod petis?" No; this is impossible, adds the holy doctor, for by his promises the Lord has obliged himself to grant us the graces we demand of him. "By his promises he made himself a debtor"—S. Aug. de verb. Dom. Serm. 2.

8. But, you will say, I am a sinner, I deserve chastisement and not favours; and, therefore, I am afraid, because I am not worthy to be heard. But St. Thomas answers, that the efficacy of prayer to obtain the divine graces depends not on our merits, but on the mercy of God. "Oratio in impetrando non innititur nostris meritis, sed soli divinæ misericordiæ"—2. 2. q. 178. a. 2. ad. 1. Hence, Jesus Christ has said: "Ask, and it shall be given you, ... for every one that asketh receiveth"—Luke xi. 9, 10. "Every one," says the author of the Imperfect Work, "whether he be a just man or a sinner"—Hom. 18. The Lord has promised to hear the prayers of all, not only of the just but also of sinners. But to remove every apprehension, our loving Redeemer has said in another place: "Amen, amen, I say to you, if you ask the Father anything in my name, he will give it you"—John xvi. 23. As if he said—sinners, you have no claim to be heard by my Father; ask his graces then in my name; that is, through my merits, and I promise that he will give whatsoever you ask. How consoling the words of St. James: "If any want wisdom, let him ask of God who giveth to all men abundantly and upbraideth not"—i. 5. If, says the apostle, any of you want wisdom—that is, the divine love, what is he to do? Let him ask it of God, who usually dispenses his graces with a liberal hand; that is, he bestows greater favours than are asked of him. He adds, and he "upbraideth not;" that is, when we ask of God his gifts, he does not reject our petition and upbraid us with the insults we have offered to him, but appears then to forget all our ingratitude; he accepts our homage and hears our prayer.

9. Thirdly, it is necessary to pray with perseverance. St. Hilary says that to obtain the divine graces it depends on our continuance in prayer. "Obtineri in sola precum mora est"—Cant. 6, in Matt. The Lord wishes to hear some the first time, others the second, and others the third time. Hence, since we know not how often we are to present our supplications in order to be heard, we must always continue to ask the graces we stand in need of, and particularly the gift of final perseverance, which (as the Council of Trent teaches, Sess. 6, c. 13) we cannot merit. But St. Augustine says it may be merited in a certain manner by prayer; that is, by praying for it, it is surely obtained. "Hoc ergo donum Dei (preseverantiæ) suppliciter emereri potest, idest supplicando impetrari"—De dono pers. c. 6. But to obtain this gift, and to be saved, it is, as St. Thomas observes, necessary for every one to ask it continually of God. "In order to enter heaven, continual prayer is necessary"—3. p. q. 39. a. 5. And before him our Saviour said the same: "We ought to pray always, and not to faint"—Luke xviii. 1. And the Apostle says: "Pray without ceasing"—1 Thess. v. 17. It is not enough, says Cardinal Bellarmine, to ask the gift of perseverance once or a few times; in order to obtain it every day, we must ask it every day. "Quotidie petenda est ut quotidie obtineatur." On the day we neglect to ask it, we may fall into sin and be lost.

10. St. Gregory teaches, that God wishes to give us perseverance, but in order to give it he wishes to be importuned, and as it were, forced by our prayers. "God," says the holy doctor, "wishes to be asked, he wishes to be forced, he wishes, in a certain manner, to be overcome by importunity"—In Ps. 6, pœn. This appears from the repeated exhortations of our Lord: "Ask, and you shall receive; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you"—Luke xi. 9. Ask, seek, knock; this is necessary, particularly to obtain strength to conquer violent temptations: we must pray and multiply prayers until we are freed from the temptations. Let us continually repeat: My Jesus, mercy; Lord, assist me; do not permit me to be separated from thee. It is also necessary to ask always the spirit of prayer, or the grace to pray continually—that great gift, which God has promised to the family of David. "And I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of prayers" —Zach. xii. 10. Mark the words "of grace and of prayers;" which mean, that prayer is always united to the grace we desire. He who perseveres in prayer may be certain of not being taken in the snares of his enemies. "A net is spread in vain before the eyes of them that have wings"—Prov. i. 17. In vain, says the wise man, is the net cast before the eyes of the bird; for it instantly flies away and escapes. Thus, they who pray escape all temptations; for by prayer they instantly fly to God, and he delivers them. And let us remember that there never can be any excuse for a sinner who says that he fell because he had not strength to resist; for the Council of Trent has declared that "God does not command impossibilities, but by his precepts he admonishes you to do what you can, and to ask what you cannot do, and he assists you that you may be able to do it"—Sess. 11. God does not command impossibilities; but in giving us his precepts, he admonishes us to do what we can with the ordinary grace which he gives to all; and in order to be able to do what we cannot do with the ordinary grace, he admonishes us to ask the additional helps which we stand in need of; and whenever we ask them he is ready to grant them.

11. The Lord, then, hears the prayers of all, because he has promised to hear them; but it is necessary to know that this promise does not extend to temporal favours—such as bodily health, the acquisition of wealth, or the attainment of a post of honour, and the like. For God frequently, and justly, refuses these gifts, because he knows that they would be injurious to the soul. "The physician," says St. Augustine, "knows better than the patient what is useful for him"—Tom. 3, c. 212. It is not the sick man, but the physician who cures his malady, that knows what is most conducive to his recovery. If these temporal favours be the object of prayer, they should be asked with resignation, and on the condition that they will be conducive to our eternal salvation: if we ask them without this resignation, the Lord will not listen to our prayers. But in praying for spiritual blessings, we must pray not conditionally, but absolutely, and with a firm confidence of obtaining them. Behold how our Saviour encourages us to ask such graces: "If you, then," he says, "being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father from heaven give the good spirit to them that ask it?"—Luke xi. 13. If you, said our Lord, who are evil, and full of self-love, cannot refuse your children what they ask, how much more will your heavenly Father, who loves you more tenderly than the fondest parent loves an only son, grant the good spirit, that is, the graces which are profitable to the soul, whenever we ask them from him?

12. O God! how often are the prayers of certain persons offered for temporal graces only? The time of prayer, says St. Teresa, is not a time for treating with God on matters of little importance. Let us ask for virtues, for the divine light in order to fulfil the divine will: let us ask for meekness, for patience under crosses, for perseverance, and for divine love, which, as St. Francis de Sales says, contains all other good gifts: let us ask the grace to pray always, and to recommend ourselves continually to God. "If," says St. Augustine, "thou dost not hear these prayers of thy servants, what wilt thou hear?"—De Civ. c. 8. O my Lord, what petition wilt thou grant if thou neglect these that are so pleasing to thee? Ah! the Lord desires ardently to enrich us with his gifts, because he is infinite goodness! So great is his desire that, as St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi says, when we ask his graces, he, in a certain manner, considers himself under an obligation to us, and thanks us, because we then give him an opportunity of satisfying his desire of promoting our welfare. If he does not bestow his graces upon us, the fault is ours: it is because we do not ask them of him. He, then, who remains in his poverty, is undeserving of compassion: he is poor because he does not wish to ask of God the graces which are necessary for him. Hence, St. Teresa used to say that she would have wished to ascend a mountain, from which she could be heard by all men, and from which she would continually exclaim: "O men, pray! pray! pray."

13. I will not dilate more on this subject, because, as I have said in the beginning, I have written at length on it in several places, and particularly in the little book on prayer (which is now in the hands of many,) and therefore I will not weary those who have read it by repeating the same things. But I would wish to do nothing else than write, and speak always on this great means of prayer; for, on the one hand, I see that the holy Scriptures, the Old as well as the New Testament, exhort us so often to pray, to ask, and cry out, if we wish for the divine graces. "Cry to me, and I will hear thee"—Jer. xxxiii. 3. "Call on me . . . . . and I will deliver thee"—Ps. xlix. 15. "Ask, and it shall be given you"—Matt. vii. 7. "All things whatsoever you ask, when you pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come unto you"—Mark xi. 24. "You shall ask whatsoever you will, and it shall be done unto you"—John xv. 7. "If you shall ask me anything in my name, that I will do"—John xiv. 14. There are a thousand similar passages. I know not how the Lord could better declare this desire to bestow his graces upon us, or the necessity we are under of asking them, if we wished to obtain them. The holy fathers, also, continually exhort us to pray. And to speak the truth, I complain of preachers, of confessors, and of spiritual writers, because I see that neither preachers, nor confessors, nor spiritual writers speak as much as they ought of the great means of prayer. And in so many courses of lenten sermons which have been published, where shall we find a discourse on prayer? Scarcely do we find a few passing words on it. Hence, I have written at length on this subject in so many of my little works; and when I preach, I do nothing else than say and repeat: pray! pray! if you wish to be saved, and to become saints. It is true that to become saints we must have all virtues, mortifications, humility, obedience, and principally holy charity; and to acquire these virtues, other means besides prayer are necessary—such as meditation, communion, holy resolutions; but unless we pray, all our meditations, communions, and resolutions will not make us practice either mortifications, or humility, or obedience: we shall neither love God nor resist temptation; in a word, we shall do no good. Hence, St. Paul, after having enumerated many virtues necessary for a Christian, tells us to be "instant in prayer," (Rom. xii. 12,) in order, as St. Thomas says, to show that for the attainment of the virtues we stand in need of, it is necessary to attend to constant prayer, because without it we shall not have the divine aid, which is necessary for the practice of virtue.

14. Let us conclude. Blessed sister of the Lord, if you wish to be saved and become a saint, recommend yourself always to Jesus Christ, to his divine Mother, to your angel guardian, and to your holy advocates. Keep your mouth always open, and your heart always vigilant, saying: "My God, assist me; my God, assist me; most holy Mary, pray for me; my holy Angel-guardian and my holy advocates, assist me. The great servant of God, and the great missionary, Father Leonard of Port Maurice (who died a few years since at Rome, with the reputation of a saint,) used to say, that we should not allow a moment to pass without repeating with the tongue, or in the mind, the little prayer—My Jesus mercy! My Jesus mercy! These words, he would say, contain an act of sorrow and a prayer for grace to sin no more. He relates, in his most beautiful work (The Sacred Manual for Nuns,) that he knew a holy man who always repeated these words, My Jesus, mercy! so that he sometimes repeated them three hundred times in a quarter of an hour. I advise you to do the same; endeavour to repeat this prayer as often as you remember it: when you awake, at your meditations, after communion, at your work, at your recreations, at table, and at the grate, repeat continually: My Jesus, mercy! My Jesus, mercy! And in repeating it let your intention be to say: My Jesus, by my sins I would deserve hell, but trusting in thy mercy, I hope for pardon and grace to love thee always: my Jesus, assist me. And do not forget to recommend yourself to the divine mother, who is called the treasurer and dispensatrix of the divine graces. Hence, St. Bernard says: "Let us ask grace, and let us ask it through Mary; for what she seeks she finds, and she cannot be disappointed"—Serm. de Aquæd.

PRAYER.

(It would be advisable to repeat the following prayer every day.)

Eternal Father, thy Son has promised that thou wilt grant us all the graces which we shall ask of thee in his name. Trusting, then, in this great promise, I, in the name and through the merits of Jesus Christ, ask of thee the following graces; and what I ask for myself, I intend to ask for all men. First, I ask the pardon of all the offences I have offered to thee, for which I am sorry above all things with my whole heart, because I have despised thy infinite goodness; and I purpose to die a thousand times rather than ever more offend thee. Secondly, I ask thy divine light, which will make me see the vanity of all the goods of this earth, and thy infinite greatness and goodness. Thirdly, I ask thy holy love, which will detach me from all creatures, and particularly from myself, that I may love nothing but thee and thy most holy will. Enkindle the fire of thy love in my heart. Fourthly, give me confidence in the merits of Jesus Christ, and in the patronage of Mary. Fifthly, I ask holy perseverance in thy grace. Lord, thou knowest my weakness and my frequent infidelities after so many promises; if thou do not constantly assist me with thy aid, I shall again miserably lose thy graces: my God, do not permit me to be separated from thee. I purpose, in all my temptations and necessities, to have recourse to thee; and I am certain that as often as I recommend myself to thee, I shall receive thy aid; but I fear that I shall neglect to have recourse to thee, and that this neglect may be the cause of my ruin. Ah! Eternal Father, through the love which thou dost bear to Jesus Christ, grant me the grace of prayer, that is, the grace to pray to thee always for thy aid, always repeating: My God, assist me; my Jesus, mercy; Mary, my mother, pray for me. To thee, in fine, I turn, O Mary, my advocate and hope; thou dost obtain from God whatsoever thou askest. I entreat thee, through the love which thou bearest to Jesus Christ, to obtain for me holy perseverance and the grace to recommend myself always to thy Son and to thee. Amen.

CHAPTER XXI.

*On devotion to most holy Mary.

1. Oh! how great the grounds of hope of the soul that trusts in the intercession of this great Mother of God. Behold the words which the holy Church applies to Mary on

* In a notice to the reader, prefixed to the Glories of Mary, St. Alphonsus explains the sense in which he wished his doctrine regarding the privileges of the Blessed Virgin to be understood. He concludes this explanation in the following words: "Then, to say all in a few words, the God of all holiness, in order to glorify the Mother of the Redeemer, has decreed and ordained that her great charity should pray for all those for whom her divine Son has paid and offered the most superabundant price of his precious blood, in which alone is our salvation, life, and resurrection. And, on the foundation of this doctrine, and inasmuch as they accord with it, I have intended to lay down my propositions which the saints, in their affectionate colloquies with Mary, and in their fervent discourses upon her, have not hesitated to assert"—Glories of Mary, Monza edition, vol. I, p. II, 12.

In the third chapter of the first volume (p. 123, 124,) St. Alphonsus compares the hope which we place in the Blessed Virgin to the confidence which a person has in a minister of state, whom he asks to procure a favour from his sovereign.

"Whatsoever Mary obtains for us, she obtains it through the merits of Jesus Christ, and because she prays in the name of Jesus Christ"—Glories of Mary, vol. I, p. 88.

"Mary, then, is said to be omnipotent in the manner in which omnipotence can be understood of a creature; for a creature is incapable of a divine attribute. Hence, she is omnipotent, inasmuch as she obtains by her prayers whatever she asks"—Ibid., p. 223.

To obtain favours through the intercession of Mary, by practicing devout exercises in her honour, "the first condition is, that we perform our devotions with a soul free from sin, or at least with a desire to give up sin."

her festivals: "He tnat shall find me shall find life, and shall have salvation from the Lord"—Prov. viii. 35. He that shall find me, says Mary, shall find the life of grace here and eternal glory hereafter. Addressing the divine Mother, St. Anselm says: "Virgo benedictissima, sicut impossibile est, ut a te aversus, et a te despectus salveter: ita ad te conversus, et a te respectus impossibile est ut pereat" —De excel. Virg. cap. 4. The saint says that as it is impossible for a person not devoted to, and protected by Mary, to be saved, so, on the other hand, it is impossible for him to be lost who recommends himself to Mary, and is regarded by her with love. St. Antonine says that all those who are defended by this great queen are necessarily saved: "Necessarium est quod hi, ad quos Maria convertit oculos suos, pro eis advocans, salventur et glorificentur" —Part 4, tit. 50. St. Bonaventure writes that they who obtain the protection of Mary shall, even while they live on this earth, be acknowledged as companions by the saints in glory, and that they who shall carry the badge of servant of Mary, shall be written in the book of life: "Qui acquirit gratiam Mariæ, cognoscetur a civibus paradisi: et qui habuerit hunc characterem, adnotabitur in libro vitæ"—In Psal. Thus, to be devoted to Mary is a mark of predestination. The angelic doctor says that Mary is called "the Star of the Sea," because, as navigators are directed to the port by means of the pole star, so Christians are guided to paradise by Mary: "Sicut navigantes per stellam ad portum diriguntur, ita et Christiani diriguntur ad gloriam per Mariam"—Opusc. 7.

2. Should a person truly devoted to Mary be lost (I will hereafter explain what is meant by a true client of Mary,) it would be because she is either unable or unwilling to assist him. "But no," says St. Bernard, "she can neither want the power nor the will"—Hom. 2, in Missus est. It is impossible for a true and persevering client of Mary to be lost; because she can neither want the power nor the will to assist him. Let us, then, see, in the first place, how great is Mary's power before God in favour of her clients. To inspire us with confidence in this great advocate, the holy Church invokes her under the title of powerful Virgin—Virgo potens, ora pro nobis. Yes, that God who is omnipotent, has, as she herself has said, given her great power. "He that is mighty hath done great things to me" Luke i. Hence, St. Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, has written: "The Son is pleased that the Mother should pray to him, because he wishes to grant her whatever she asks, in order to repay her for the favour received from her in giving him flesh." St. Bridget heard Jesus say to Mary: "Ask what you wish from me, for your petition cannot be fruitless"—Rev. lib. 1, cap. 3. My mother, ask of me what you wish: you know that I cannot reject any of your petitions. He then added: "Because you refused me nothing on earth, I will refuse nothing to you in heaven." You refused me nothing while I lived on earth, it is right that I refuse you nothing now that you are with me in heaven.

3. But what is the principal reason why the prayers of Mary are so powerful before God? St. Antonine says: "The prayer of the Mother of God partakes of the nature of a command; hence, it is impossible that she should not be heard"—Part 4, tit. 15, cap. 17. sec. 14. The prayers of Mary being the prayers of a mother, partake in a certain manner of the nature of a command, and therefore they cannot be rejected. Hence, Blessed Albertus Magnus used to repeat the words of the Church, "montra te esse matrem," in this sense: O Lady, show thyself a mother; ask thy Son, as his mother, to have mercy on us. Cosmas of Jerusalem asserts that the protection of Mary is omnipotent; "Omnipotens auxilium tuum, O Maria." Yes, says Richard of St. Laurence, it is but just that the mother should share the power of the Son: "Cum autem eadem sit potestas filii et matris, ab omnipotente Filio omnipotens mater facta est"—Lib. 5, de Laud. Virg. The Son is omnipotent by nature, the mother is omnipotent by grace; that is, she obtains by her prayers whatsoever she wishes.

4. Let a sinner be ever so abandoned, says St. Gregory of Nicomedia, if he has recourse to Mary she will save him by her intercession. "You have insuperable strength lest the multitude of our sins should overcome your clemency. Nothing resists your power: for the Creator regards your glory as his own"—Orat. de exit. B. V. O Mother of God, thou hast invincible power, that thy clemency may not be conquered by the multitude of sins. Nothing can resist thy power since the Creator regards as his own the glory of his mother. Thou, then, says St. Peter Damian, canst do all things, for thou canst inspire even those who are in despair with hopes of salvation: "Nihil tibi impossibile, quæ etiam desperatos in spem salutis potes relevare"—Serm. 1, de Nat. B. V. As often as the devil tempts us to diffidence, let us turn to Mary, and say to her with St. Germanus: "Thou, O Mary, art omnipotent in saving sinners; thy prayers are all-powerful with God, because thou art mother of true life"—Serm. 3, in Dorm. B. V.

5. Let us examine, in the second place, how great is Mary's desire to assist her clients. Of what use, says St. Bonaventure, would Mary's power be to us, if she had no regard for us? But, adds the saint, let us hold for certain, that as the Virgin is the most powerful of all the saints before God, so she is the most solicitous of all for our salvation. "And who, O Lady," says St. Germanus (Serm. de Zona Virg.) "after thy Son, feels greater solicitude for us than thou dost? Who defends us so powerfully in our afflictions? Who labours so hard for the conversion of sinners? O Mary, thy protection is so great that we cannot comprehend it." St. Andrew Avellino used to call Mary "the agent of paradise." But what does she do in heaven? She prays continually for us, and obtains for us all the graces we ask. She said one day to St. Bridget (Rev. lib. 1, cap. 6,) I am called, and I really am, the Mother of Mercy; for such the mercy of God has made me: "Ego vocor ab omnibus mater misericordiæ et vere misericordia Dei misericordem me fecit." And who but God in his mercy, because he wishes to save all, has given us this great protectrix? "Ideo (adds Mary) misererit qui ad misericordem, cum possit, non accedit." Miserable, and miserable for eternity, shall be the man who is damned, because when it was in his power in this life to invoke my intercession, he neglected to have recourse to me who am so compassionate to all.

6. Richard of St. Victor says that Mary is so full of mercy, that when she sees our miseries, she instantly assists us: she cannot behold a soul in want without coming to her relief. "Adeo replentur ubera tua misericordia, ut alterius miseria notitia tacta lac fundat misericordiæ: nec possis miserias scire et non subvenire"—In Cant. cap. 23. It was thus she acted when she lived on this earth, as we learn from what happened at the marriage of Cana in Galilee. When the wine failed, she did not wait to be asked, but taking pity on the affliction and shame of the spouse, she besought her Son to console them, saying, "they have no wine;" and induced him to change, by a miracle, water into wine. If, says St. Bonaventure, Mary's compassion for the afflicted was so great while she lived in this world, her pity for us is certainly far greater now that she reigns in heaven, where she has a better knowledge of our miseries, and greater compassion for our afflictions: "Magna fuit erga miseros misericordia Mariæ adhuc exulantis in mundo, sed multo major est regnatis in cœlo"—In spec. B. V. cap. 8.

7. Ah! let us not neglect to have recourse in all our necessities to the divine mother, who is always prepared to assist all who invoke her intercession. "Invenies," says Richard of St. Laurence, "semper paratam auxiliari." Bernardine da Bustis adds, that whenever we have recourse to her we shall find her hands full of mercies and graces: "Invenies eam in manibus plenam misericordia et liberalitate"—Marial. 2, serm. 5, de nom. Mar. Richard of St. Victor says that Mary's heart is so full of compassion that, as soon as she perceives the wants of the miserable, she prevents their supplications, and obtains relief for them before they ask it: "Velocius occurrit quam invocetur, et causas miserorum anticipat"—In Cant. cap. 23. Why, then, says St. Bernard, should we fear that when we have recourse to Mary she will not console us? She is not austere, she does not inspire terror; she is all sweetness and benignity to those who recommend themselves to her: "Quid ad Mariam accedere trepidat humana fragilitas? Nihil austerem in ea, nihil terribile, tota suavis est." And can she be otherwise than beneficent to those who ask her prayers, when she herself goes in search of the miserable to save them? Behold how she invites all, and encourages them to hope for all good if they have recourse to her: "In me is all hope of life and of virtue; come over to me all"—Eccl. xxiv. 25. On this passage Pelbart says: "She calls all, the just and sinners." The devil, according to St. Peter, goes about seeking whom he may devour ("Circuit quærens quem devoret,") 1 Peter v., but this divine mother, says Bernardine da Bustis, goes about seeking whom she may save: "Ipsa semper circuit, quærens quem salvet"—Marial. p. 3, Serm. 3. To obtain salvation through her intercession it is enough to ask the aid of her prayers. A holy soul used to say that to receive the divine graces it is sufficient to ask Mary to obtain them for us. St. Bonaventure has written that Mary's desire for our welfare and salvation is so great, that she is offended not only with those who do her a positive injury, but also with those who do not ask favours from her: "In te Domina peccant non solum qui tibi injuriam irrogant, sed etiam qui te non rogant"—In spec. Virg. Hence, the saint used to say that when he looked at Mary he beheld mercy itself stretching out its hands to raise him up from his miseries: "Certe Domina cum te aspicio, nihil nisi misericordiam cerno." For, he would add, this great lady knows not, and has never known, how to behold without compassion, or to leave without succour, a person in misery who recommends himself to her: "Ipsa enim non misereri ignorat, et miseris non satisfacere nunquam scivit." Mary's constant occupation in heaven consists in asking mercy for the miserable. St. Bridget once heard Jesus say to his holy mother: "My mother, ask what you wish from me." And what was Mary's answer? "I ask mercy for the miserable"—Rev. lib. 1, cap. 46. As if she said: My Son, since thou hast made me Mother of Mercy and advocate of the miserable, what else will I ask from thee than mercy for those who are in misery? And because poor sinners are the most miserable of all, she has her eyes always turned to them in order to assist them. David says that the eyes of the Lord are upon the just, "Oculi Domini super justos"—Ps. xxxiii.; and, according to Richard of St. Laurence, this Mother of Mercy has her merciful eyes as well upon the just as upon sinners. This author says that she treats us as a mother treats her child: a mother always keeps her eyes on her child to prevent him from falling, and to raise him up should he fall: "Oculi Domine super justos et peccatores sicuti oculi matris ad puerum ne cadat: vel si cecederit, ut sublevet." The Lord has constituted Mary the universal advocate of all. "As," says Idiota, "she is the Queen of all, so she is the advocate of all." Denis the Carthusian says that she is, in a special manner, the advocate of sinners, because the guilty stand in greater need of succour than the innocent. Hence, he calls her the advocate of all sinners who invoke her intercession: "Advocata omnium iniquorum ad se confugienium." And before him St. John Damascene called Mary the city of refuge for all who fly to her.—De Dormit. Virg. Hence, St. Bonaventure says: "Respirate ad illam perditi peccatores, et perduct vos ad portum"—In Ps. 8. Poor abandoned sinners, do not despair, raise your eyes to Mary and be comforted, trusting in the clemency of this good mother; for she will rescue you from the shipwreck you have suffered, and will conduct you to the haven of salvation. Let us then say, with St. Thomas of Villanova: "Eia advocata nostra, officium tuum imple." O holy Virgin, since thou art the advocate of the miserable, assist us who are the most miserable of all. Let us, says St. Bernard, ask grace, and ask it through Mary. "Quæramus gratiam et per Mariam quæramus"—Serm. de Aquæd. The grace which we have lost she has found, says Richard of St. Laurence; we then, should go to her in order to recover it: "Cupientes invenire gratiam quæramus inventricem gratiæ"—De laud. Virg. When the Archangel Gabriel announced to Mary that God had chosen her to be the Mother of the Word, he said to her: "Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found grace with God"—Luke i. But how can that be? Mary was never deprived of grace; on the contrary, she was always full of grace. How, then, could the angel say that she had found grace? Cardinal Hugo answers that she did not find grace for herself, because she always possessed it: but she found it for us who had miserably lost it. Hence, he says, that in order to recover it we should go to Mary and say to her: "O Lady, property should be restored to him who has lost it; the grace which thou hast found is not thine, for thou hast always possessed it; it is ours, we have lost it. To us, then, thou shouldst restore it." Behold the cardinal's words: "Sinners, who by your sins have forfeited the divine grace, run, run to the Virgin, and say to her with confidence: Restore to us our property which you have found."

8. Oh! if all sinners had recourse to Mary, with a determination to amend their lives, who would ever be lost? They who have not recourse to Mary are lost. St. Bridget heard our Saviour say to his mother: "You would show mercy even to the devil were he to ask it with humility." The proud Lucifer will never humble himself so far as to recommend himself to Mary; but were he to humble himself to this divine mother, and ask her aid, she would not cast him off, but would deliver him from hell by her intercession. By these words Jesus gives us to understand that Mary obtains salvation for all who have recourse to her. Hence, St. Basil calls her a public hospital. Public hospitals are established for the poor who are afflicted with sickness, and the greater the poverty of the invalid the stronger his claim to admission. Hence, according to St. Basil, Mary receives with the greatest promptness the most abandoned sinners who have recourse to her. Ah! says St. Bernard, this great queen feels no horror for any sinner, however great the stench of his sins; if the miserable man flies to her protection she disdains not to stretch forth her hands and to rescue him from the state of perdition. "Tu peccatorem quantumcumque fœtidum non horres: si ad te suspiraverit, tu illum a disperationis barathro pia manu retrahis"—S. Bern. Or. paneg. ad B. V. Our Lord revealed to St. Catherine of Sienna, that he has chosen Mary to draw men, and particularly sinners, to his love: "Hæc est a me electa tanquam esca dulcissima ad capiendos homines, potissimum peccatores"—Apud Blos. Mon. spir. Mary said to St. Bridget, that there is no sinner, however abandoned by God, for whom, if he invoked her aid, she will not obtain the grace to return to God and find mercy: "Nullus est ita abjectus a Deo qui si me invocaverit, non revertatur ad Deum, et habiturus sit misericordiam"—Rev.

lib. 1, cap. 6. She also said that as the magnet attracts iron, so she draws to herself and to God the hardest hearts: "Sicut magnes attrahit ferrum, sic ego attraho dura corda" —Rev. lib. 3, cap. 32.

9. The holy Church wishes that we call this divine mother our hope: "Spes nostra salve." The impious Luther said, that he could not bear to hear the Church teaching us to call Mary our hope; God alone, he said, is our hope; and God himself curses them who place their hopes in any creature. Yes, God curses those who trust in creatures independently of him, but we hope in Mary as a mediatrix with God. For, says St. Bernard, God has placed in the hands of Mary all the treasures of the goods which he wishes to dispense to men: "Totius boni plenitudinem posuit in Maria, ut si quid spei in nobis est, si quid gratiæ si quid salutis, ab illa noverimus redundare"—Serm. de Aquæd. Hence, the Lord wishes us to acknowledge that all good comes from Mary, for he has ordained that all the graces which he will give us should pass through the hands of Mary. Hence, St. Bernard called her his greatest confidence, and the entire ground of his hope: "Hæc maxima mea fiducia, hæc toto ratio spei meæ"—Loc. cit. St. Bonaventure called Mary the salvation of them who invoke her: "O salus te invocatium." Hence, according to St. Bonaventure, to be saved it is enough to invoke Mary. Whenever, then, the devil terrifies us with the fear of being lost, let us say to Mary with the same Saint, "In thee, O Lady, have I hoped, may I not be confounded for ever." In thee, after Jesus, I have placed all my hopes; thou hast to watch over my salvation and to deliver me from hell. But, says St. Anselm, hell is not the lot of any true client of Mary, for whom she prays even once, and says to her Son that she wishes him to be saved: "Æternum væ non sentiet, pro quo semel oraverit Maria."

10. I have said that no one truly devoted to Mary is lost. But in order to escape illusion, let us examine what is necessary in order to be a true client of Mary. In the first place, a good intention of changing one's life and a will to offend God no more are necessary. To the Princess Matilda, St. Gregory VII. wrote: "Pone finem in voluntate peccandi, et invenies Mariam promptiorem matre carnali ad te adjuvandum"—Lib. 1, ep. 47. Put an end to the will of sinning, and I promise you that you shall find Mary more willing than any carnal mother to assist you. The Virgin said one day to St. Bridget: "Quantumcumque homo peccat, statim parata sum recipere revertentem. Nec attendo, quantum peccaverit, sed cum quali intentione redit: nam non dedignor ejus plagas ungere, et sanare, quia vocor et vere sum mater misericordiæ"—Rev. lib. 2, cap. 23. How encouraging to sinners are these words! Let a sinner, says Mary, be ever so abandoned, if he come to me I am ready to receive him the moment he returns. Nor do I attend to the sins he has committed, but only to the intention with which he comes to me. If he come with a desire to change his life I will not disdain to apply a remedy and heal his wounds, for I am called, and truly am, the Mother of Mercy. Mother of Mercy! that is, her clemency and her compassion for our miseries incline her to love and assist us with more than maternal tenderness. But she herself declared to the same St. Bridget, that she is a mother only to those who wish to amend their lives: "Ego sum quasi mater volentium se emendare"—Rev. lib. 4, cap. 138. Hence, Mary is not a mother to obstinate sinners. Should any one find himself bound by any passion, and not as yet resolved to renounce sin, but desirous of being delivered from it, let him pray to Mary to obtain aid for him to break the chain of hell, and let him at least endeavour to begin to resist the passion and to remove the occasion, and this good lady will stretch out her hand and will comfort him. This, St. Bridget heard from the mouth of Jesus Christ himself. Addressing Mary, he said: "Conanti surgere tu tribuis auxilium, et neminem relinquis vacuum a tua consolatione." To him who endeavours to emerge from sin in order to return to God you, my mother, give aid; you do not allow any one to depart from you without consolation.

11. In the second place, to be a true client of Mary it is necessary to secure her protection by prayers and other acts of devotion. It is true that she prays for all; but she always prays most efficaciously for those among her servants who honour her most. And remember, that because she is most grateful and liberal, she repays with the great graces every little act of devotion which we perform in her honour. "Cum sit magnificentissima," says St. Andrew of Crete, "solet maxima pro minimis reddere"—Orat. 2, de Dorm. Virg. Let us, then, see the acts of devotion which we may perform in honour of this our most loving mother.

12. First, say every morning at rising and every evening before going to bed three Aves in honour of the purity of Mary, adding: "O Mary, through thy pure and immaculate conception obtain for me purity of body and sanctity of soul." And place yourself under her protection, that she may preserve you from sin during the day and during the night. Salute her also with an Ave Maria as often as the clock strikes, and whenever you leave or return to the cell or pass by any of her images; and endeavour at the beginning of every action (whether spiritual or temporal) to salute her with an Ave Maria: blessed shall be the actions which are commenced and terminated by an Ave Maria. When we salute this great queen, particularly with the Angelical Salutation, which is so pleasing to her, she always obtains for us in return some favour from heaven. Secondly, do not omit to say the Rosary every day, or at least five decades of it. This is a devotion practiced generally by all the faithful, even by seculars, and has been favoured by the sovereign pontiff with immense indulgences. But observe, that to gain the indulgences of the Rosary, it is necessary to accompany the recital of it with the consideration of the mysteries; it is also necessary that your name be registered in the book of the Rosary which is kept by the fathers of the Order of St. Dominick, and that the beads be blessed by them. Some religious also say the Little Office of the Blessed Virgin. You might at least say along with the Rosary the Office of the Name of Mary, which consists of five Psalms. Say, also, every day three Paters and Aves in honour of the most holy Trinity for the graces bestowed on Mary. The holy Virgin once revealed that this devotion is very pleasing to her. Thirdly, fast every Saturday, and on the vigils of all the festivals of Mary, and if you cannot fast on bread and water, fast at least in the ordinary way, or eat only of one dish, or abstain from something which you feel a desire to eat. Perform some mortification on Saturday, which is the day dedicated by the Church to the honour of the divine mother. Fourthly, make every day a visit to some image of your queen; and in your visit ask Mary to obtain for you holy perseverance and the love of Jesus Christ. Fifthly, do not let a day pass without reading at least a small portion of a book which treats of Mary. There are many books of this kind—True Devotion towards the Blessed Virgin, by Father Crasset; Mutual Affections between Mary and her Clients, by Father Auriemma; The Devout Servant of Mary, by Segneri; Affections to Mary, by Nieremberg: there are many others which you can read. I, too, have written a work on the Virgin, entitled The Glories of Mary, of which several editions have been published.

13. Sixthly, perform devoutly the Novenas of the festivals of the Virgin. You can practice the following devotions in these Novenas; first, an additional meditation of half-an-hour; secondly, recite the Ave Maria and Gloria Patri nine times in honour of the Virgin. I do not advise many vocal prayers, because I would rather see you make many acts of love, or many petitions to Jesus and Mary. For example, I love thee, O my Jesus; I love thee, O Mary, my mother; or, Mary, mother of God, pray to Jesus for me. You can make a hundred or at least fifty of these acts or prayers in the day. Thirdly, visit each day the image of the Virgin three times, and at each visit repeat the preceding acts of love or prayers, and at the end of the visit ask some particular grace for the benefit of your soul. Fourthly, endeavour, but with the advice of your confessor, to communicate more frequently during the Novenas. Fifthly, on these days perform some particular act of mortification by the use of the discipline or little chains; or by fasting, or at least by abstaining from fruit, or from something else; and on the vigil fast if you can on bread and water. I recommend to you the following excellent devotion. Among the festivals of Mary select one to which you feel most devoted, such as the Immaculate Conception, the Annunciation, the Assumption, or the Feast of Dolours (to which all should have a special devotion,) and after communion on the festival you select, offer yourself in a special manner to serve her, choosing her for your mistress and mother, asking pardon of your negligences in honouring her during the past year, and promising to serve her better in the year to come. It would be well, with the permission of the superior, to procure a public Novena along with the exposition of the blessed sacrament, but without music or the usual accompaniments, even on the festival: otherwise all will end in vanity and disturbance of mind, as sometimes happens in the festival of nuns. Would to God that on such festivals more was not lost than gained.

14. Seventhly and lastly, be careful to recommend yourself often in the day to the protection of Mary. Know that, among all devotions, that which is most pleasing to her consists in having frequent recourse to her, and in frequently asking her to obtain for you the divine graces. "Blessed is the man," says the Church, in the name of Mary, "that heareth me, and that watcheth daily at my gates"—Prov. viii. 34. Happy the man that watches at at the gates of my mercy. Mary is called the Mother of Mercy on account of her ardent desire to promote our welfare: hence, the greatest pleasure which we can give her is to recommend ourselves to her and to ask her prayers. She desires to assist us, but she wishes that we may pray to her. "Roganda sum ut velim," says blessed Albertus Magnus, in the name of Mary, "quia si volo necesse est fieri." That I may wish to obtain grace you must pray to me; for if I wish to ask, what I ask of my Son is necessarily given. Hence, St. Bernard says: "In periculis, in augustiis, in rebus dubiis Mariam invoca"—Hom. 2, super Missus. In the dangers of consenting to sin, in afflictions, in doubts, call on Mary for succour. The saint adds: "Non recedat ab ore, non recedat a corde." Let her powerful name be always in your mouth, by the constant invocation of it, and in your heart, by great confidence in her intercession. St. Bonaventure says, that a person cannot mention the name of Mary without obtaining some grace. "Nomen tuum devote nominari non potest, sine nominaxtis utilitate"—Spec. B. V. cap. 8. And St. Germanus calls the name of Mary the respiration of the soul. "As," says the saint (de Zona Virg.,) 'respiration of the body is a sign of life, so the name of Mary in the mouth of her servants is a proof of life, for this name at once procures and preserves the life of grace." All would do well to ask of God every day the gift of confidence—first, in the blood of Jesus Christ, and afterwards in the intercession of Mary.

15. If you love Mary, endeavour to induce others to love her. Endeavour, as often as you can, to inspire all with devotion to the Virgin, by relating some devout example, or by proposing some particular exercise to be performed in her honour, or some favour to be asked of her. She promises paradise to all who love her and seek to inspire others with her love. "They that work by me shall not sin. They that explain me shall have life everlasting"—Fest. Concep. B. M. Noct. 1. How great the consolation which you shall experience at death from all you shall have done during life in honour of Mary. Father Binetti relates (Perf. di N. S. cap. 31,) that he once assisted a dying servant of Mary, who before death said: "O my father, if you knew the happiness I feel on account of having served the most holy Mother of God? I could not explain the joy which I experience at this moment." Endeavour, then, to remain always at the feet of this tender mother. And thank the Lord unceasingly: among the mercies he has shown you, the particular devotion which he has given you to his holy mother, is a special grace; this devotion is a great proof that he wishes your salvation in a special manner. In recommending your salvation to her, say to Mary with St. John Damascene: "O Mother of God, if I place my confidence in thee I shall be saved. If I am under thy protection, I have nothing to fear; for to be devoted to thee is to have arms of salvation, which God grants only to those whom he specially wishes to be saved"—Serm. de Nat. cap. 4.

PRAYER.

My lady, if thou pray for me, I shall be saved; for thou dost obtain by thy prayers whatsoever thou wishest. Pray, then, for me, O great Mother of God: for thy Son hears thee, and grants whatever thou askest. It is true that I am unworthy of thy protection, but thou hast never abandoned a soul that had recourse to thee. O Mary, I consign my soul to thee; thou hast to save it. Obtain for me perseverance in the divine grace, and the love of thy Son and of thee. I love thee, O my queen, and I hope always to love thee. Do thou also love me; take me under thy protection, and have pity on me; grant me this favour through the love which thou bearest thy Son. Behold the confidence which I place in thy clemency, and do not cease to assist me in all my wants. I know that thou wilt not cease to help me as often as I recommend myself to thee; but obtain for me also the grace to have recourse to thee in all my temptations and in all my dangers of losing God. Assist me particularly at the hour of my death: obtain for me the grace that with my last breath I may pronounce thy name and the name of thy Son, saying: Jesus and Mary, to you I recommend my soul. Amen.

CHAPTER XXII.

ON THE LOVE OF JESUS.

SECTION I.

On the obligation of a Religious to love Jesus Christ.

1. The sole object of a religious in this life should be to love her most amiable spouse, Jesus Christ. The first and principal command which the Lord imposes on us is to love him with our whole heart. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart"—Deut. vi. 5. Because he loves us intensely, he wishes to be loved ardently by us. Hence, he so pressingly demands our love, and calls for our heart: "My son, give me thy heart"—Prov. xxiii. 26. And what, says Moses, does the Lord demand of you, but that you love him with your whole heart? "What doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but that . . . . . thou love him, and serve the Lord thy God with all thy heart"—Deut. x. 12. To our love he promises himself as a reward. "I am thy reward exceeding great"—Gen. xv. 1. To their faithful subjects the monarchs of the earth give riches and honours; but to those who love him our God gives nothing less than himself. But though our love should receive no other reward, for us it should be enough to know that God loves them who love him. He frequently declares in the Scriptures that he loves all who love him. "I love them that love me"—Prov. viii. 17. In another place he says: "He that abideth in charity abideth in God, and God in him"—1 John iv. 16. And Jesus Christ has said: "He that loveth me shall be loved by my Father, and I will love him"—John xiv. 24.

2. All our perfection, then, consists in the love of God; for, as St. Augustine says, love is the only virtue which unites us to God. "Charitas est virtus conjungens nos Deo." All other virtues, without charity, profit us nothing; but charity brings with it all virtues: for, as the Apostle teaches (1 Cor. xiii. 4,) it is patient, it is kind, it is not puffed up, it is not ambitious of honours, it seeks not its own interest, but suffers all things, believes all things, and hopes for all things. Love, says the same Apostle, is the fulfilment of the law. "Plenitudo legis dilectio"—Rom. xiii. 10. Hence, St. Augustine said: "love, and do what you wish." He who loves another is careful not to give him the least displeasure, and studies to do everything in his power to please him. Hence, also, the soul that loves God abhors, as death, the smallest offence against his divine Majesty, and endeavours to the best of her ability to please him.

3. Let it be remembered that perfect charity consists in loving God for himself. To love God as the author of our felicity is the love of concupiscence, which, strictly speaking, belongs not to charity, but to hope; to love God because he deserves to be loved, because he is infinite goodness, is the love of friendship, or true charity. But it is necessary to observe, that hope is in no way opposed, nor any obstacle to perfect charity. In admitting a state of charity which excluded all hope, the Bishop of Cambray fell into an error which was condemned. We love God, because, on account of his perfections, he deserves to be loved, and we would love him though there were no reward for loving him; but, since he wishes to give us a reward, and even commands us to hope for it, we are bound to hope for it and to desire it. Besides, to desire paradise in order to possess God, and to love him better, is true and perfect charity; for eternal glory is the consummation of love. There the soul, entirely forgetful of herself and divested of all self-love, loves God with all her strength, and with a most pure love: it is thus that the saints in bliss happily lose themselves in God.

4. If we knew that in an earthly kingdom there was a prince, beautiful, holy, and learned, kind and merciful, surely he would win our affection, though he had conferred no favour upon us. But what are the amiable qualities of such a prince compared with the perfections of God? God possesses all perfections, and possesses them in an infinite degree. He has all the qualities which could render him amiable; he is infinite goodness, infinite beauty, infinite wisdom, and infinite mercy. Hence, his goodness, of itself, merits all our love. In the lives of the fathers of the desert it is related, that in the desert there were two monks who were brothers; to one of them the devil said that the other was doomed to perdition: the simple monk believed the fiend and was greatly afflicted. Being asked one day the cause of his affliction, he answered that it was revealed to him that his brother was doomed to hell. The brother humbly answered: "If such be the will of the Lord, may it be for ever blessed; but still I will love him to the utmost of my power in this life, for I love him neither through fear of hell, nor through the hope of heaven, but only because he deserves to be loved." On the following night an angel appeared to the deluded monk, and told him that his brother's name was written among the number of the elect.

5. We should, therefore, love God because he deserves to be loved on account of his infinite perfections. We should love him, at least through gratitude for the love which he has borne us. If the affection of all men, of all angels, and of all the saints, were united together, they would not equal the smallest part of the love which God bears to a single soul. St. John Chrysostom says that God loves us more than we love ourselves. I, says God himself to each of us, have loved you from eternity, and through pure love have drawn you out of nothing, and have placed you in this world. "I have loved thee with an everlasting love"—Jer. xxxi. 3. Our parents have been the first to love us in this world; but they have loved us only after they had known us; but God loved us before we had existence. Our fathers or mothers were not as yet born, and God loved us; the world was not as yet created, and God loved us: and for how long before the creation of the world did he love us? Perhaps a thousand years, or a thousand ages. It is useless to multiply years and ages; for God loved us as long as he has been God; he has loved us as long as he has loved himself. Hence, the holy virgin St. Agnes had reason to say: I am prevented by another lover. When the world and creatures sought her love she answered: No, I cannot love you; since my God has been the first to love me, it is but just that I consecrate my whole heart to him alone.

6. Our God, then, has loved us as long as he has been God; and through pure love has drawn us out of nothing; and among so many possible beings which he could, but never will create, he has chosen us, and has placed us in this world. For the love of us he has also created so many other beautiful creatures, the heavens, the hills, the seas, the fountains, and all other creatures that are on this earth. But he was not content with giving us these creatures: his love was not satisfied till he gave us himself. "He hath loved us, and delivered himself for us"—Ephes. v. 2. From the ruin caused by sin, he took occasion to show his love; accursed sin had robbed us of divine grace, had closed paradise against us, and made us slaves of hell. The Lord could redeem us from these evils in many ways; but he chose to come in person on earth, in order to become man, to redeem us from eternal death, and to obtain for us the divine friendship and heaven, which we had lost, exciting by such a prodigy of love the astonishment of heaven and creation. How great the wonder which an earthly monarch would excite, were he, through love for a slave, to become a slave, or for the sake of a worm, to become a worm? But our wonder should be infinitely greater at the sight of the Son of God, humbled, so as to become a man, for the love of man: "He emptied himself, taking the form of a servant . . . . . and in habit found as a man"—Phil. ii. 7; at the sight of a God clothed with flesh: "And the Word was made flesh"—John i.

7. But the wonder increases when we see all that this Son of God has done and suffered for the love of us miserable worms. To save us it was enough for him to have given a single drop of his blood, to have shed a tear, or to have offered a prayer; for a tear or prayer offered to the Eternal Father by a Man-God for our salvation would have been of infinite value, and therefore sufficient to save the world and an infinite number of worlds. But no; Jesus Christ wished not only to save us, but through the immense love which he bore us, he wished to gain all our love. Hence, to make us understand the extent of his love, he chose a life of pain and ignominy, and a death the most cruel and shameful of all deaths. "He humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, even unto the death of the cross"—Phil. ii. 8. O God! had our Saviour not been God, but an equal and a friend, what more could he do than give his life for us? "Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends"—John xv. What do you say? Do you believe it? Can you then think of loving any other object than Jesus Christ? A certain author says that before the incarnation of the Word, man might be able to doubt whether God loved him with a tender love; but after the incarnation and death of Jesus Christ, how is it possible to doubt it? How could he show us greater tenderness of affection than by suffering so many torments, so many insults, and by dying on a cross? Alas! we have heard of the Incarnation of the Redeemer, of a God born in a stable, of a God scourged, of a God crowned with thorns, and dying on a cross. O holy faith, enlighten us, and make us understand the excess of love which made our God become man, and die for the love of us. But the desire which Jesus Christ had to suffer and die for us should be a subject of still greater astonishment. During his life our Saviour used to say: "I have a baptism wherewith I am to be baptized; and how am I straitened until it be accomplished"—Luke xii. 50. I am to be baptized with the baptism of my own blood, not to wash myself, but to cleanse men from their sins; and how am I straitened until my desire be accomplished. O God, Jesus Christ is not loved by men because they will not even think of the love which the amiable Redeemer has borne them. How is it possible for a soul that thinks on his love to live without loving him? "The charity of Christ presseth us"—2 Cor. v. 14. St. Paul says, that a soul that reflects on the love of Jesus Christ feels herself, as it were, constrained to love him. In meditating on the passion of the Saviour, the saints were inflamed with love, and sometimes broke out into exclamations of wonder and tenderness. "We have seen," exclaimed St. Laurence Justinian, "the author of wisdom become foolish through excess of love." We have seen a God as it were foolish through love for us. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi being one day wrapped up in an ecstasy, took an image of Jesus crucified into her hands, and cried aloud that he was foolish through love. "Yes, my Jesus," she continued to exclaim, "thou art foolish through love. I say, and I will always, O my Jesus, that thou art foolish through love."

9. Had not faith assured us of this great mystery of redemption, who could ever believe that the Creator of the universe should voluntarily suffer and die for his own creatures? O God, if Jesus Christ had not died for us, who among men would dare to ask a God to become man and save us by his death? Would it not have appeared folly even to think of it? And in reality, when the gentiles heard the apostles preaching the death of Jesus Christ, they regarded it as a fable, and as St. Paul attests, called it incredible folly. "We preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews indeed a stumbling-block, and unto the gentiles foolishness" —1 Cor. i. 23. Yes, says St. Gregory, it appeared to them folly that the author of life should die for man. "Stultum visum esse, ut pro hominibus auctor vitæ moreretur"—Hom. 6. How, said the gentiles, can we believe that a God who has no need of one, and is most happy in himself, should descend from heaven to earth, assume human flesh, and die for men, his miserable creatures? This would be to believe that a God had become foolish for the love of men. But it is a truth of faith that Jesus the true Son of God, for the love of us, his miserable and ungrateful creatures, has abandoned himself to torments, to ignominies, and to death. "He hath loved us, and hath delivered himself for us"—Eph. v. 2.

10. And why has he done so? He has done it, says St. Augustine, that man might understand the immense love which God bears him. "Propterea Christus advenit ut cognosceret homo, quantum eum diligat Deus." And long before, Jesus himself said: "Ignem veni mittere in terram, et quid volo nisi ut accendatur"—Luc. xii. 49. I have, he says, come on earth to kindle the holy fire of divine love, and I only desire to see the hearts of men burning with its blessed flames. In contemplating Jesus in the garden, captured as a criminal by the soldiers, St. Bernard, turning to his Lord, exclaimed: "Qui tibi et vinculis." My Jesus, what hast thou to do with cords and chains? These belong to us slaves and sinners; but thou art the king of heaven, thou art holy. And what has reduced thee to the condition of a malefactor, the vilest and most wicked among men? "Quis hoc fecit? Amor dignitatis nescius: triumphat de Deo amor"—Serm. 84, in Cant. And what has effected all this? Love, which is regardless of dignity when there is question of gaining the affection of the beloved. In a word, concludes the saint, God, whom no one can conquer, has been conquered by love. His love for man has made him take human flesh, and consume his divine life in a sea of sorrows and reproaches. Love triumphs over God.

11. In another place, the same St. Bernard contemplates our Redeemer condemned to death by Pilate; and asks of Jesus Christ: "Quid fecisti innocentissime Salvator ut sic judicaveris?" Tell me, O my beloved Lord, who art innocence itself, what evil hast thou done to merit the barbarous sentence of condemnation to the death of the cross? But, adds the saint, I understand the cause of your death; the crime thou hast committed is thy love. "Peccatum tuum est amor tuus." Thy offence is the love thou hast borne to men; it is this and not Pilate that condemns thee to death, and makes thee die. But, O Lord, exclaimed holy Job, "what is the man that thou shouldst magnify him? or why dost thou set thy heart upon him?" —Job vii. 17. My God, what is man whom thou hast so highly honoured? What benefit has he ever conferred upon thee that thy whole heart should, as it were, be occupied in seeking his welfare and in endeavoring to make known to him the affection thou dost bear him? St. Thomas says that God loved man "as if man were his god; as if without him he could not be happy;" as if God could not be happy unless man were also happy. And, O blessed sister, had you been the god of Jesus Christ, what more could he have done for you than to spend so many years in pain and toils, and afterwards submit to a cruel death? Had Jesus Christ to save the life of his own Father, what more could he have done than he has done for you? But, O God, where is my gratitude? Had one of your servants suffered what your spouse has endured for your salvation, could you ever forget his sufferings or live without loving him? Ah! at the thought of the death of Jesus Christ each of us should be, as it were, foolish through love for him, and should exclaim with St. Paschal: My love has been crucified for me: my love has died for me.

12. But what we have not as yet done we may now do. God gives us time to do it. Jesus has died for us, that by his love for us he might gain the entire dominion of our hearts. "To this end," says St. Paul, "Christ died . . . . . that he might be the Lord both of the dead and of the living"—Rom. xiv. 9. He has died that we might live no longer to ourselves, but only to that God who has given his life for us. "Christ died for all," says the same Apostle, "that they also who live may not now live to themselves but unto him who died for them"—2 Cor. v. 15. Contemplating the death of Jesus Christ, and the love with which he died for men, the saints esteemed it little to forfeit for his sake property, honours, and life. How many grandees, how many kings and queens, and empresses have renounced their kingdoms to shut themselves up in a cloister and live only for the love of Jesus Christ? How many millions of martyrs have esteemed themselves happy to be able to sacrifice their lives for him amid the most horrible torments? How many young and noble virgins, renouncing the nuptials of the first monarchs of the earth, have gone with joy to death, to make some return of love for the love of God who had died for the love of them? And do you, blessed sister, think that you have as yet done anything for the love of Jesus Christ? What token have you as yet given of the love you bear him? It is certain that as he has died for the saints, for St. Lucy, for St. Agatha, for St. Agnes, so he has also died for you.

13. Consider also the special graces which he has bestowed on you, and which he has withheld from so many of your companions, who had as good a claim to them as you had. How many noble ladies, how many princesses, have been born among infidels and heretics, and live miserably in the state of perdition, bereft of the sacraments, of sermons, and of the other helps necessary for salvation? And to you he has given the grace to be born in the bosom of the true Church. He has also given wealth to your parents that you might have more opportunities and means of acquiring eternal salvation. He has also chosen you for his spouse from among so many of your companions, whom he has left in the midst of the dangers of the world. From these dangers he has rescued you (and perhaps against your inclination,) and has brought you into his own house, where he assists you continually by his lights and interior calls; by the sacraments, by sermons, by the example of your good sisters, and by so many other helps to salvation. Consider also the many mercies he has show you in pardoning so many offences which you have committed in the world and in religion. It was enough for him that you repented and asked forgiveness: he instantly pardoned you. You ungratefully offended him again, and he, with the same love, pardoned you; and instead of inflicting chastisements on your multiplied offences, he has multiplied graces, lights, calls, and consolations. And, behold, at this moment, while you read this book, he continues to call you to his love. What are your thoughts? What resolutions do you make? What do you wait for? Perhaps you intend to wait till the Lord calls you no more, and abandons you.

PRAYER.

My dear Redeemer, I see that thou hast placed me under too many obligations to love thee. My soul has cost thee too high a price. I should be ungrateful if I loved anything but thee, or if I loved but little a God who has given his blood and his life for me. If thou, O my Jesus and my spouse, hast died for me, your miserable servant, it is but just that I die for thee, my Lord and my God. I renounce the love of all creatures, and consecrate my heart to the love of thee alone. I choose thee for my only good, my only love. I love thee; O my love, I love thee. I repeat, and wish always to repeat, I love thee, O my love; I love thee. Thou dost wish that I love thee ardently, and that I love nothing but thee. My Saviour, I wish to content thee; I wish to love thee ardently; I wish for thee alone. Yes; to love thee alone, my God, my treasure, my all. Assist me for the sake of thy mercy, and grant that I may fully satisfy thee. O Mary, my mother, do thou too assist me; thou art the dispenser of all the gifts of God, and particularly of the great gift of divine love. This gift I ask thee to obtain for me. Through thee I hope for it.

SECTION II.

On the means of acquiring divine love, and on the acts of love which a religious should practice towards Jesus Christ.

1. The Lord commands all men to love him, and to love him with their whole hearts: "Diliges Dominum tuum ex toto corde tuo." But he wishes in a special manner that religious, his chosen spouses, love him with all their affections. Hence, he has favoured them with so many lights and spiritual graces that they may seek to love nothing but this most loving spouse. St. Teresa used to say that God bestows a great favour on the souls he calls to his love. You, O blessed sister, are one of these fortunate souls; but to consecrate yourself entirely to the love of your spouse, as he desires, you must resolutely adopt the means.

2. The first means is to desire ardently to attain that perfect love which will make your heart entirely belong to him. Ardent desires are the wings with which the saints flew to unite themselves with God by perfect love. If you have not this desire, at least ask it of God; for without it you will never be able to arrive at any degree of holiness, but with the aid of such desires you will soon attain sanctity. St. Teresa has left her spiritual children many excellent lessons on this subject. In one place she says: "Let our thoughts be great: from great thoughts our good shall come." In another place she writes: "We must not debase our desires, but must trust in God; for by continual efforts we shall, with the divine aid, gradually arrive at the perfection which the saints have attained." She attests that she had never seen a cowardly soul make as much progress in many years as generous souls make in a few days. Hence, she said: "The Lord is as much pleased with our desires, as if they were already executed." St. Gregory says that he who pants after God with his whole heart finds him: but to wish for God with the whole heart, the soul must be stripped and emptied of worldly affections. This is the second means.

3. The second means necessary to love God with the whole heart, is detachment from all love which is not for God. He wishes to have the exclusive possession of our whole heart: he will admit no companion. St. Augustine relates (lib. 1, de cons. etc. cap. 22,) that the Roman Senate, after adoring thirty thousand gods, refused to adore the God of the Christians, saying that he was a proud God who wished to be worshipped alone without companions. But this our Lord justly claims; for he is the only and the true God; and our only true lover, who, because he loves us tenderly, wishes that we love him with our whole hearts. To love God with the whole heart implies two things: it implies first the expulsion from the heart of every affection which is not for God. The enamoured St. Francis de Sales said: "If I knew that there was a single fibre in my heart which was not for God, I would instantly pluck it out." If the heart is not emptied of earthly affections, the love of God cannot enter. But in a heart detached from creatures, the fire of divine love burns and always increases. St. Teresa used to say: "Detach the heart from creatures; seek God and you shall find him." "The Lord is good . . . to the soul that seeketh him"—Lam. iii. 25. He gives himself entirely to them who leave all things for his sake, as he once said to St. Teresa: "Now that you are all mine, I am all yours." He says the same to you, if you divest yourself of all things in order to belong entirely to him. Father Segneri, the younger, wrote to a spiritual soul: "Divine love is a thief that robs the soul of all her affections, so that she can say: What else do I wish for than thee alone, O my Lord?" And St. Francis de Sales has said: "The pure love of God consumes all that is not God, in order to convert everything into itself; for all that is done for the love of God is love." In the life of the venerable Joseph Caraccioli, of the order of Theatines, we read that after the death of a brother, being in company with his relatives, he said: "Ah! let us reserve our tears for a better occasion; to weep over the death of Jesus Christ, who has been to us a father, a brother, and a spouse, and has died for the love of us." Every religious should reserve all her tenderness and compassion for Jesus, her spouse.

4. St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say that she is a true religious who can say: My God, and my all; my God, you are my all. Remember, blessed sister, that when you were espoused to Jesus Christ, you said: "The kingdom of the world, and all ornaments of the earth, I have despised for the love of Jesus Christ; whom I have seen, whom I have loved, in whom I have believed, towards whom my heart inclined." I have renounced the world and all its pomp for the love of my spouse, whom I know to be the most amiable of all spouses, and therefore in him I have placed all my affections and all my hopes. And when other creatures seek to enter your heart, dismiss them, saying that you have given your heart to Jesus Christ, and that there is no room for them. It is divine love that makes a monastery the reverse of the world, in which all despise what the world esteems, and love what the world hates.

5. Above all, to love Jesus Christ with our whole heart, it is necessary to deny ourselves by embracing what is painful to self-love, and by abstaining from what self-love seeks. St. Teresa once refused to taste a dish which was brought to her in sickness. The infirmarian entreated her to eat it, saying that it was well dressed. The saint replied: "It is because it is well dressed that I do not wish to taste it." Hence, we ought to abstain from all things that are agreeable because they please us. Hence, we should turn away the eyes and not look at certain objects of curiosity, because they gratify the sight. Hence, we should abstain from such an amusement because we feel a predilection for it; we should serve an ungrateful sister because she is ungrateful; we should take such a medicine because it is bitter. Beware, says St. Francis de Sales, lest self-love should seek to have part in things the most holy, and should make it appear to us that nothing is good in which we do not feel satisfaction. Hence, the saint used to say that even virtues should be loved with detachment. For example, we ought to love mental prayer and solitude; but when obedience or charity takes us away from meditation or solitude, we must not be disturbed, but must embrace with peace whatever happens by the will of God, however repugnant it may be to our inclinations. The venerable Father Balthassar Alvarez used to say that our Lord often commands creatures to turn their back upon us, and abandon us, that we may run to him; but let us be careful to leave them and unite ourselves to God before they forsake us.

6. "The path of the just, as a shining light, goeth forwards, and increaseth even to perfect day"—Prov. iv. 18. The wise man says that the life of the just always increases to perfect day. But who arrives at this perfect day? He who, without inclining to anything until he knows the divine will, wishes, or wishes not, what God wills or wills not. Hence, we should pray in the words of the same father Alvarez: "Lord, grant me the grace to find peace in whatever thy divine will shall appoint for me; for my part, I neither ask more delights or less afflictions." Oh! how happy the life of the nun who lives detached from all things. Let us be persuaded that there is no one more content in this world than the man who despises all its goods, and wishes only for God. Hence, each of us should live on this earth as a wilderness, saying: Here there is no one but myself and God. And with this spirit of detachment, endeavour, O blessed sister of the Lord, to renew every day the religious vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, intending to divest yourself of all attachment to property, to pleasure, and to self-will. Make this renovation of the vows in a few words, that you may make them more easily and more frequently. It is enough for you to say: My Jesus, for the love of thee I renew my vows, and purpose to observe them with exactness: I entreat thee to grant me the grace to be faithful to thee.

7. The third means of obtaining the perfect love of Jesus Christ is to meditate frequently on his passion. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say that after being made the spouse of a crucified God, a religious during her whole life, and in all her actions, should have nothing before her view but Jesus on the cross; and should have no other occupation than the contemplation of the love which this divine spouse has borne her. Were a person to suffer for a friend insults, stripes, and imprisonment, how great the pleasure he would derive from hearing that his friend frequently remembered his sufferings. But if, when his sufferings are mentioned, the friend should endeavour to change the subject of conversation, and should refuse even to think of them, how great the pain which he would feel at such ingratitude. Such the pain given to the heart of Jesus by the souls that think but little on the sorrows and ignominies which he suffered for the love of them. But, on the other hand, he is greatly pleased with all who continually remember and meditate on his passion. I say that the only object of all the meditations of a religious ought to be the passion of Jesus Christ: she should make at least one meditation on it every day.

8. To me it appears, as I have observed in another place, that it was to supply different mysteries for the meditations of his beloved spouse, that our Redeemer wished to suffer different species of pains and reproaches, chains, buffets, scourges, thorns, spittle, and nails; it was for this end that he wished to represent himself to us suffering in so many different ways: at one time sweating blood in the garden, at another, bound and captured by the soldiers; now clothed with a white garment, the badge of a fool; again, torn with scourges; now crowned with thorns as a king of sorrows and mockery, and again, going to death with a gibbet on his shoulders; at one time suspended by three nails on a cross, and at another, hanging dead on that bed of sorrow with his side opened. But remember that we should not meditate on the passion of Jesus Christ in order to enjoy spiritual consolations, but for the sole purpose of inflaming our souls with the love of our Redeemer, and of learning from him what he wishes us to do; offering ourselves to suffer every pain for his sake, because he voluntarily suffered so much for the love of us. Our Lord once revealed to a holy solitary that there is no exercise better calculated to kindle in us the divine love, than the meditation of his passion.

9. The fourth means to attain perfect love is to make frequent acts of love. As fire is kept alive by fuel, so love is nourished by acts. He who loves, in the first place, rejoices at the welfare and happiness of his beloved: that is called love of complacency. Rejoice, then, O blessed sister, in the infinite felicity of your God, and delight in it more than if it were your own; for you should love your spouse more than yourself, and your greatest joy should consist in the thought that your beloved wants nothing, and shall not for all eternity want anything necessary for infinite beatitude. Hence, you ought to feel consolation in knowing that so many millions of angels and saints love him perfectly in heaven. You should also rejoice whenever you hear that any soul on this earth loves Jesus Christ with a tender love. Secondly, he who loves desires to see his beloved loved by all: such love is called the love of benevolence, which you should practice by desiring to see Jesus Christ ardently loved by all men. Hence, you would do well to speak frequently to others of his love, in order to kindle it in the hearts of all those with whom you converse. You should, moreover, desire to see your spouse known to, and loved by all who neither know nor love him. And to you, the contempt with which he is treated by so many Christians should be the only source of pain. Would she be considered an affectionate spouse, who should behold with indifference an insult offered to, or a wound inflicted on her husband? You should grieve still for the offences which you remember to have hitherto given your spouse; for these you should constantly make acts of contrition—this is called sorrowful love.

10. Thirdly, he who loves, prefers his beloved to all other objects, and this is the love of preference, with which God principally wishes us to love him. The first degree of this love consists in being prepared to lose all things rather than forfeit the grace of God. Does the Lord demand too much of us, when he requires that we prefer him to everything in this world? And what are creatures compared with God? The emperor Domitian tempted St. Clement to worship idols, by presenting to him, as the reward of his impiety, gold, silver, and precious stones. The saint heaved a deep sigh, and began to weep, when he saw his God compared to earthly goods. We should be ashamed to say to God: Lord, I love thee above all things. For to speak in this manner to God, would be the same as if we said to the king: My Sovereign, I esteem you more than chaff and mire! But our God is content with being loved by all creatures, which, compared with his Sovereign Majesty, are infinitely less than chaff or dung is in comparison of the first monarch of the universe. Father Vincent Caraffa, of the Society of Jesus, used to say, that were the whole world in his possession, he would surrender it in an instant at the bare name of God. It is necessary, then, to live always in such a disposition of mind, that we would forfeit property, character, life, and all things sooner than lose God. We must say with St. Paul: "Neither death, nor life, nor height, nor depth, shall be able to separate us from God." The soul that feels she cannot live without God, possesses a great treasure; but the soul that aspires to his perfect love should not only be ready to die a thousand times rather than offend him by mortal sin, or even by a deliberate venial sin, but should also prefer the pleasure of God before all self-indulgence, and should be prepared to suffer every pain in order to please her Lord. Consider, O sister! that Jesus Christ has preferred your salvation before his own life: in you, then, it is not much, nay, it is nothing, to prefer his pleasure to every personal good.

11. Fourthly, they who love, refuse not; on the contrary, they rejoice to suffer for their beloved, in order to give him proof of their love. It was thus that Jesus Christ has shown his love for us. He who desires to suffer for Jesus, desires, or at least embraces in peace the occasions of suffering. For loving souls, tribulations, as it were, plane the way to an union with God; for in suffering they unite themselves with him by stronger love. Father Balthassar Alvarez used to say, "that he who in afflictions peacefully resigns himself to the divine will runs to God." In a word, every event, whether it causes joy or sorrow, tends to unite the soul that loves more closely to her God. "To them that love God all things work together unto good"—Rom. viii. 28. It is certain that all his arrangements are intended for our good. Our Lord said one day to St. Gertrude: "With the same love which I created man, I ordain for his good all the prosperity or adversity which I send him." Be particularly careful, O blessed sister! to unite yourself with God in the time of sickness. Infirmities prove the true lover. In sickness you must be obedient to the physician and to the infirmarian. Ask for nothing, and take the remedies prescribed, however nauseous and painful. Do not complain of anything; be meek and thankful to all. Resign yourself entirely to the will of God, and offer yourself to suffer whatsoever he sends, uniting yourself with Jesus on the cross, desiring not to descend from it, until it shall be his pleasure, content even to leave your life upon it, if such be his will. Fix your eyes on the crucifix, and when you see that your sufferings are far less than those which Jesus suffered for your sake, you will bear the pains of sickness with greater peace. "Love your spouse," says St. Francis de Sales, "in consolations and tribulations: he is as lovely when he consoles as when he afflicts you, because he does all for your welfare." If you love Jesus Christ, love contempt, love correction; and entreat the confessor and superior to correct and chastise you in the way which they deem most profitable to you. The same St. Francis de Sales used to say, that the monastery is like an hospital to which the sick come to be cured, in which they cheerfully submit to the nauseous medicines and painful operations which may be prescribed. Hence, you shall ask your spiritual physician not to exempt you from any remedy necessary for your recovery.

12. Fifthly, he who loves always remembers his beloved. Thus, the soul that loves God, always thinks of him, and always endeavours to show him her affection by inflamed sighs and ejaculations of love. This is called aspirative love. Endeavour frequently, by day and night, in the cell and out of the cell, in solitude and in company, to say frequently to your crucified spouse: My God, I wish for nothing but thee. My God, I give myself entirely to thee. I wish whatsoever thou wishest. Dispose of me as thou pleasest. It will be enough to say to him: "My God, I love thee; or, my God, my all." A loving sigh, an elevation of the heart, a look towards heaven, an affectionate glance at the crucifix, or at the most holy sacrament, will be sufficient, even without words. Such acts are, perhaps, the most useful, because they can be made more easily and more frequently, and sometimes they are the most fervent.

13. In the Old Law, the Lord commanded that fire should burn unceasingly on his altar. "And the fire on the altar shall always burn"—Lev. vi. xii. St. Gregory says that these altars are our hearts, on which God commands that the fire of his divine love should always burn. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with thy whole heart. These words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thy heart . . . . . and thou shalt meditate upon them sitting in thy house, and walking on thy journey, sleeping and rising. And thou shalt bind them as a sign on thy hand, and they shall be, and shall move before thy eyes. And thou shalt write them in the entry, and on the doors of thy house"—Loc. cit. v. 6. Mark the earnestness with which the Lord inculcates the precept of loving him. I wish, he says, that this command be always within your heart, that you meditate upon it continually, sitting in your house, walking on your journey, in bed and out of bed. I wish that you keep it printed on your hands, and present to your eyes: I wish that you write it on the entrance, and on all the doors of your house, in order to remember it always, and fulfil it by acts of love. Hence, theologians justly teach, that though it is probable that we are not bound to make acts of faith and hope more than once a year, still we are obliged to make an act of charity at least once a month; some say that we ought to make it more frequently.

14. Father Balthassar Alvarez used to call monasteries of religious, hospitals of persons wounded with divine love; furnaces of love, in which the hardest rocks are reduced to ashes. Such they ought to be; all men should burn continually with the love of Jesus Christ. But, alas! few, very few, have this ardent love. I say, that if Jesus Christ could weep at present, and were capable of sadness, his greatest sorrow would arise from seeing himself so little loved by his spouses. Do you, then, blessed sister, who have been made his spouse, love him; love him at least through compassion, at the sight of your God who is so little loved, and particularly by religious. Tell me, were a mighty prince of noble birth, of immense wealth, of extraordinary beauty and holiness, to take for his spouse a poor, ignorant, deformed, ill-dressed peasant, and were he, by making her his spouse, to render her rich, noble, wise, and happy, what would she not do for such a spouse? How great the affection and respect which she would feel for him at the thought of his greatness and her own vileness! She would do nothing else than thank him continually for his goodness towards her. With what care would she labour to gratify his inclinations, and to please him in all things? How careful would she be to execute, without reply, all his wishes? And should it be necessary to suffer any pain for his sake, with what promptness and joy would she submit to it; how happy would she esteem herself in giving him such a proof of her affection and gratitude? And should she see him despised by his subjects, would she not weep continually? Were she, even through her own negligence, to offend him, how great would be her sorrow, and with what humility would she cast herself in tears at his feet, and ask pardon? Should she be at a distance from her spouse, oh! would she not count the hours and moments of her absence from him? How great the happiness which she would feel in thinking of her former and present state! Apply what has been said to yourself, O blessed sister! Jesus Christ has made you, a miserable sinner, his own spouse.

15. Love, then, your spouse; but know that unless you love him with your whole heart, he will not be satisfied. Love him not only with affections of the heart, but love him also by works. Some, who are friends only in name, say to their friends: Friend, you are master of all I possess; but in effect give him little or nothing. But others, who are real friends, give to their friend the better part of their possessions, and offer him the rest. A soul that resolves to give her soul to God without reserve, divests herself of all earthly things to which she sees her soul attached; she resolves to subject all her inclinations to holy obedience; she resolves to mortify herself in all that gratifies self-love, to disregard self-esteem, and to embrace with joy derision and contempt. Oh! with what security does such a resolution make her walk! What confidence in God does it inspire; how prompt does it render the soul to bear crosses and contradictions! It makes her perform all her actions with a pure intention; it impels her to pray to Jesus and Mary for help to execute her purposes, and make her firm and resolute in seeking in all things only what is pleasing to God. When difficulties occur, the same resolution animates her to say with courage: I have to please God, let pleasure be given to him, though death should be the consequence. Should she sometimes fall into a defect, the resolution she has made prevents dejection, inspires hope, and gives her courage to attend with greater care for the future to what she had before neglected. But this resolution must be frequently renewed in meditation, at communion, in the visits to the blessed sacrament; and at rising in the morning it is particularly necessary to make the following protestation: My Jesus, I again give myself to thee, and I promise to endeavour to do always what I shall know to be most pleasing to thee. I unite this oblation of mine with the perfect unreserved oblation of thyself, which thou hadst made to thy Eternal Father. Give me strength to be faithful to thee. Thy passion is my hope; thy merits, thy promises, thy love, are my hope. O Mary, my mother, pray to Jesus for me; obtain for me holy perseverance and the love of thy Son.

16. If, blessed sister, you wish to acquire the great treasure of the love of God, I recommend you to ask it continually, saying: My Jesus, give me love; Mary, obtain for me the gift of divine love; my holy angel-guardian, my holy advocates, obtain for me the gift of love. It will be sufficient to say love; God will be always pleased with it, and will always infuse some new sentiment of devotion, will kindle some new flame, and will excite some holy desire in your heart. Our Lord is liberal in dispensing all his gifts, but particularly in granting the gift of love to them who ask it; for this love is what he demands of us above all things. But let us ask not so much a tender as a strong love, which will make us conquer all human respect, and all the repugnances of self-love, and render us prompt in doing, without delay or reserve, the things that are pleasing to God; and let us, therefore, accustom ourselves to seek what is most pleasing to God in all, even in small things; for we shall thus be prepared to do great things. And when you are molested with the apprehension of not having strength to overcome yourself in some extraordinary difficulty, trust in God, and say: "I can do all things in him who strengtheneth me." Say: What I am of myself unable to do, I shall be able to do with the aid which I expect from God.

17. St. Augustine says, that all the time which is not spent for God is lost time. At death we shall receive consolation only from having loved Jesus Christ. O God! how great the consolation which they who have loved him shall enjoy in being able to say, with their eyes fixed on the crucifix: Jesus crucified has been my only love. Even in this life, what greater happiness can a soul enjoy than to say: I give pleasure to God; I am in the company of God. But we must give ourselves to God, not for our own gratification, but to please him, altogether forgetful of ourselves, saying with the spouse in the Canticles, "He brought me into the cellar of wine; he set in order charity in me; stay me up with flowers, compass me about with apples; because I languish with love"—Cant. ii. 4, 5. By wine is signified holy charity; for as wine deprives men of their senses, so that they no longer see or hear, but are, as it were, dead; so the soul inflamed with divine love lives as if she no longer had any sense of earthly things, and forgetful of created objects, wishes for nothing but God; and, therefore, she asks the flowers of holy desires, and the fruits of holy works which support the spiritual life, that is divine love, with which, and for which, she lives. But this can be said only by the soul that truly gives herself entirely and without reserve to Jesus Christ. What do you say, O blessed sister? Have you, as yet, given yourself to him, as he desires you to do? Do you still resist? Has he not done enough to merit all your love? Jesus Christ gave himself to you without reserve once on the cross, and frequently in the holy communion; what more do you expect from him? What more can he do in order to make you belong entirely to himself? Will you wait till he abandons you, and calls you no more, in punishment of your ingratitude? Arise, then, instantly, resist no longer—say to him:—

PRAYER.

Yes, my Jesus, my spouse, behold me; I will no longer resist thy love. "My beloved to me, and I to him." Thou hast given thyself entirely to me, I give myself entirely to thee. I would deserve to be cast off in punishment of my ingratitude in resisting so many calls, but the desire which thou dost now inspire of being thine without reserve, makes me hope that thou dost accept me. Accept me, O my Jesus! for the sake of the love with which thou lovedst me on the cross when thou didst die for me. My dear Lord, were I now in hell, which I have deserved, I could no longer love thee. But since thou givest me time to love thee I wish to love thee, and I wish to love nothing but thee. Ah! my beloved Saviour, how is it possible for him who thinks on thee in the manger of Bethlehem, on the cross of Calvary, or in the sacrament of the altar, not to be enamoured of thee? Whom will I love when I see that a God has died for me? I love thee, O my Redeemer, my love, my all. Increase thy holy love in my heart. Remind me always of what thou hast done and suffered for me, and do not permit me to be ever more ungrateful to thee. O blessed flames of love which consumed the life of my Jesus on the altar of the cross, come and take possession of my whole heart, and destroy every affection to creatures. O my love, I give myself entirely to thee; and if I know not how to give myself to thee as I ought, take me and make me all thine. Grant that I may speak of nothing but thy love, sigh for nothing else but to love thee and to give thee pleasure. My Jesus, I hope for all things through thy merits. I also trust in thee, O Mary, my hope, that thou wilt obtain for me the grace to love nothing henceforward but thy Son, my spouse, and thee, my mother. Amen.

CHAPTER XXIII.

[Particular admonitions for the Abbess, Vicar or Assistant, Mistress of Novices, Bursar, Sacristan, Attendant at the turn, Infirmarian, and Discreets; along with instructions to the Lay Sisters.]

Admonitions to the Abbess.

1. I WILL suppose that you have been elected abbess, not through your own ambition and exertions, but by the will of God; otherwise you will scarcely succeed well in the government of the community, because you will be bereft of the divine aid which God withholds from them who are not called to such an office. Blessed Leonard of Port Maurice relates that the abbess of a certain convent, though she had accepted the office with reluctance, was greatly tormented at death by many scruples on account of the manner in which she governed the monastery. Now, I ask, what will become of the abbess who has procured the office by her own exertions? If you have been promoted to the office without your own co-operation, be persuaded that the honour conferred has placed on your shoulders a heavy and a dangerous cross. To his sister, after she had been made superior of her convent, Father Torres wrote: "Beg of God to assist you, that you may not die under the torture of so many crosses—a martyr without merit and without a crown." Consider that you must render to God a great account, if, through you observance fail and abuses are introduced. That great religious, Father Doria, a Discalced Carmelite, used to say that religious orders are relaxed more by head-aches than by gout; that is, by diseases of the head rather than of the feet. He meant that the relaxation does not proceed from the inferiors so much as from the superiors, who shut their eyes to the neglect of rule and to abuses. Hence before you enter on your office, thank your sisters in religion for the honour they have conferred upon you; but afterwards protest that if you accept the burden in order to serve them you will not consent to lose your soul. Tell them that you will neither grant nor permit anything which your conscience condemns. This will serve to prevent the nuns from asking inconvenient permissions; and should they ask for them they will not feel much disappointed at your refusal. Thus you shall be able to govern with less restraint.

2. Watch over the observances of the rule, and be careful to prevent abuses, the removal of which, if they be once introduced into the monastery, will be morally impossible. You must take care not to allow even small defects, because by degrees they will grow into great irregularities. How have abuses, particularly regarding poverty, been introduced into religious houses? Father Francis of the Cross, a Discalced Carmelite, relates that a certain abbess appeared to a friend after death, and said that she suffered a great deal in purgatory for having neglected to watch over the observance of the rules and of the orders of the superior. She suffered in purgatory; but, alas! how many superioresses shall we see condemned to hell for the abuses introduced or permitted during the time they were in office? The superior should also go through the monastery, and see if the orders which she has given have been executed. Of what use are orders unless they are fulfilled? Hence, it is better to give few directions which will be observed, than many which will be afterwards neglected. When the religious see that the superior cares but little whether her commands are obeyed or not, they will soon begin to despise all her directions.

Be careful to see that they who are in office fulfil their obligations, but abstain from interfering much in their duties. Abstain also from imposing new burdens or new laws, for this gives great dissatisfaction to the sisters. What you should do is to enforce the observance of the existing rules. But if you find any rule neglected, such as the frequentation of the sacraments, the attendance of the companions in the parlour, the common mental prayer, mortifications which were before practiced at table, and the like, it would not be a novelty to endeavour to restore the observance of the rule: you are even obliged to do it according to the best of your ability.

Be particularly careful not to permit any particular friendships either among the sisters or with externs. And should you be unable to prevent them, you should have recourse to the prelate. In endeavouring to prevent such an abuse you may incur the displeasure of some, but there is no remedy. By the obligations of your office, which obliges you to attend more to the spiritual than to the temporal good of your community, you are bound to correct irregularities. Be careful, likewise, not to allow persons employed in the monastery to bring letters or inconvenient messages to the religious; and should you ever discover that this was done by any persons in the employment of the convent, dismiss them immediately. Be careful to hold chapters as often as the rule prescribes; and in chapter speak strongly against the more frequent defects, and against any abuse which you may witness. It is not necessary to preach a sermon, but you must speak and make yourself be heard.

3. If you wish others to be observant, you must give them an example of exactness. St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say: "Woe to the superior who by her example destroys the effect of her words." The abbess is placed on a candlestick, from which she is seen by all. How can she expect the sisters to be exact in going to meditation, to the divine office, and to other duties of the community, if she be frequently absent? She will not have even courage to complain of their negligence: and should she speak of it, her words will make but little impression; for the sisters will attend more to her example than to her words. Be careful to assist at all the exercises of the community, particularly at mental prayer, of which the superior has greater need than the sisters; for she requires a double portion of food, one for herself, and the other for the religious. In meditation you ought to beg of the Lord, in a special manner, to assist you by his light and aid to bear the burden which has been imposed upon you. Endeavour to assist at the divine office, and at the common meals; should you be absent many irregularities will probably occur.

Abstain with great care from the use of particular food, dress, or furniture; and tell the religious in office not to pay more attention to you than to the lay sisters. Be assured that if you avail yourself of the authority of your office to obtain special conveniences for yourself or your relatives, you will excite the wonder and dissatisfaction of the whole community.

4. Endeavour to govern the community by yourself alone, and not by others. It is an occasion of great annoyance and disquietude to the nuns to be obliged to obey a person who is not superior. Be careful, then, not to depend on the advice of a single sister, it would be still worse if she were a lay sister. In matters of moment, first recommend yourself to God, then ask the opinion of more than one of the religious, and do what appears best to you; but in general you ought to follow the majority of the discreets.

Be careful to treat all with equal attention, and do not show partiality to any sister, unless sickness or some other just cause require it. In the distribution of offices take particular care not to be carried away by passion or by human respect, but be guided by Christian prudence, otherwise you must render to God an account of the evils which follow.

5. Be humble and affable to all. Imagine that being made superior you should be the servant of all the sisters. Beware of governing the monastery with a high hand. By humility and meekness, not by severity, you will gain the hearts of the sisters, and thus your admonitions and corrections shall be received without murmuring or discontent. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say: "Love, esteem, and confidence, are the chains which bind the hearts of subjects, but these bonds are dissolved by pride."

If you are not affable the sisters will feel no confidence in making known their wants and afflictions, in asking the necessary permissions, and informing you of the disorders of the monastery; and thus your government will not be successful. It is not enough to have a good heart; if your manner is austere all will avoid you. It is necessary to listen to all without distinction when they come to you, otherwise you will know but little of the irregularities which take place, and much less will you be able to repair them. Should any sister appear to be reserved with you, endeavour to gain her confidence by treating her with greater affability.

When you have to assign offices, or to give employment to the sisters, or to prohibit anything, be careful to abstain from imposing precepts, unless in cases of absolute necessity; refrain as much as possible from all commanding words, and from speaking in a loud voice. Speak rather in the language of entreaty, saying: Sister, I beg of you to do such a thing; do such an act of charity for me; will you do me a favour? etc. In a word, endeavour to be loved rather than feared; and do not impose a burden of twenty pounds on a sister whom you see unable to bear more than ten.

Be meek, particularly in correcting the sisters. St. Ambrose says: "A friendly correction is more profitable than a turbulent accusation; the former excites shame, the latter provokes indignation. Let the person whom you correct believe you to be a friend rather than an enemy"—Lib. in Luc. c. 18. A friendly admonition, which points out the defects, is more useful than a sharp rebuke, which excites anger in the person corrected, and who must regard you as an affectionate friend rather than as an adversary. St. John Chrysostom says: "Vis fratrem corrigere lachryma exhorta, comprehende pedes, osculari non erubescas, si modo mederi vis"—Hom. 4, ad pop. Ant. Do you wish to see a brother corrected? Weep, exhort, embrace his feet: be not ashamed to kiss him (if necessary,) if you wish to see him soon cured. Endeavour to correct the first fault which a sister commits with great sweetness, and in private. Should public correction be necessary, in consequence of the fault being public, be careful first to correct the sister in private, praising her on the one hand for her good qualities, and on the other correcting her for the defect; then say to her, that since public correction is necessary for the good of the community, she ought not to be displeased at your correcting her before the sisters. Oh! how much more profitable are admonitions made in this manner than corrections accompanied with sharpness and severity. When the superior acts with meekness she leads the sisters (as it is commonly said) with a thread of silk. The nuns call and regard you as a mother; you, then, should treat them as children and with maternal affection. It is particularly necessary to treat the aged religious with charity and prudence. "Juvenes," says St. Gregory, "plerumque severitas admonitionis ad profectum dirigit, senes vero deprecatio blanda." In general, says the saint, it is useful (as shall be said hereafter,) to treat the young with severity when necessary; but with the aged you must have recourse to entreaties and to sweetness, saying: My sister, you know how much I esteem you; I entreat you not to violate such a rule; we are advanced in years, we must give good example to the young sisters.

Sometimes it is necessary to defer correction for a week or a month, till a convenient opportunity occurs, that the admonition may be more fruitful. Medicine administered at the proper time cures an invalid; but if given at an unseasonable time it kills him. Sometimes it is necessary to shut your eyes and overlook a fault, as if you had not seen it; that is, when the defect is a light one, confined to the person who commits it, and not imitated by others. We must leave many things to God, and implore of him to apply a remedy. Speaking of the defects of nuns advanced in years, St. Francis de Sales has said in one of his letters (lib. 4, let. 7,) "It is necessary to pay attention to the aged; they cannot be so easily managed: they are not so flexible; for the sinews of the soul, as well as of the body, have grown stiff."

But when defects are serious, such as when they give scandal or annoyance to any of the nuns, or are opposed to the observance of any rule, then you must speak. If you remain silent and dissemble, through fear of losing the good will of any of the sisters, you shall lose the good will of God. It is also necessary in certain cases, such as when you perceive friendships or aversions, to apply an immediate remedy; for the longer such evils continue the more difficult it is to repair them. In correcting the religious, it is necessary, as has been said, to use all possible sweetness; but when you see that meekness does not correct the evil, you must, as the Apostle advises, speak strongly: "Reprove, entreat, rebuke"—2 Tim. iv. 2. In her intercourse with the sisters, the superior should have a heart of honey; but, in correcting abuses and relaxations of exact observance, she requires a soul of bronze. In the rules of St. Augustine it is said that the superior should inspire subjects with fear and love—the humble and docile with love, and the proud and obstinate with fear. A certain author says that certain hearts are so obdurate that they feel only when pierced with a lance; hence, if neither meekness nor severe words are effectual, you must have recourse to penances, and to severe penances, if the defect be grievous. St. Bonaventure used to say, that the difference between relaxed and observant convents is, not that in exact monasteries there are no defects (for even there the religious are not angels, but men,) but that in the former transgressions are not proved, while in the latter they are corrected and punished. In correcting the religious, I entreat you to attend to two things, that you may be secure against error: the first is, not to have recourse to chastisement (I mean severe chastisement,) unless when it is absolutely necessary for the amendment of a sister, or for the example of others. Severe remedies are applied only in diseases which are otherwise incurable. The second is, that you do not show passion in correcting any of the sisters, but that, before inflicting punishment, you first recommend yourself to God, then take the advice of others, and afterwards act according to the best of your judgment.

Be careful not to impose penances, nor to correct a sister with severity as long as you feel disturbed. Sometimes you may think it a duty to repress without delay the insolence of a sister who treats you with disrespect before your face; but I entreat you to abstain for some time from correcting her: otherwise the correction will probably be accompanied with anger, and will be unprofitable; for the sister will regard it as the fruit of passion, rather than the effect of charity. Besides, when a sister is disturbed by anger, and her mind obscured by passion, the admonition will be of little use. Wait, then, till your and her feelings of displeasure have ceased, and then correct her as you think proper. If the correction must be severe, endeavour always to administer wine and oil; that is, after the correction say to the sister that you love her, that you have done all for her good.

When a sister is accused of a fault, do not correct or punish her immediately; but hear first the person accused, and then, after having examined the matter, act according to your judgment. It sometimes happens that things are seen in a wrong light, and that acts are taken for grievous faults, when, perhaps, they are not even trivial defects. Some superiors believe what they hear without further inquiry, and instantly reprove and punish the accused: such conduct leads to a thousand evils and disturbances, because the representation which has been made is without foundation.

May God preserve you from ever seeking revenge against a sister who has opposed or contradicted you, or has spoken disrespectfully of you during the time you are in office; guard (I say) against giving her any pain or humiliation on that account: this would cause very great scandal. You should, whenever it can be done without scruple, rather endeavour to treat with particular respect and attention any sister who may have opposed you. Thus you will please God, and give great edification to the community.

6. Be careful never to grant a permission which opens a door to any abuse which may afterwards become general, or give annoyance to the other religious. It is necessary to refuse such permission with firmness, without any regard to friendship, gratitude, or any other human motive. To please others, and injure your own soul, is not charity, but folly. But with regard to permission or dispensations which are reasonable, and do no injury to the community, it is necessary to grant them with facility, unless you wish to see many violations of rule, which, when committed without leave, are real transgressions. It is on this account that superiors have power to dispense with the rules in particular cases, for dispensations are frequently necessary, or at least useful.

7. Be careful to provide for all the wants of the sisters, particularly with regard to food and clothes. St. Antonine says (3 p. tit. 16, c. 1, sec. 2,) that a superior who does not supply the religious with necessaries when he can conveniently do it, and thus gives occasion to them to retain something for their particular use, cannot be excused from mortal sin. Some superiors make the community suffer in order to erect new buildings, and to adorn the church with ornaments of marble and silver. Certain monasteries have superfluous revenues, and the religious suffer from want; but all have not sufficient fervour to bear the want of necessaries, and thus the monastery goes to ruin. I entreat you to be liberal rather than parsimonious to the sisters, if you expect them to be exact in the observance of rule; and therefore abstain from new improvements which are not necessary, unless you wish to see the material house adorned and the spiritual edifice brought to ruin.

Be particularly careful to see the sick well treated and supplied with medicine and food: endeavour to the best of your ability to procure for them every comfort they stand in need of. The care of the sick ought to be one of the principal concerns of a superior. Our Lord recommended the care of the sick, in a special manner, to St. Teresa. When you know that a sister is ill, go immediately to visit her, and if she stands in need of a physician, send for one, and charge the other sisters to be attentive to her wants. While her illness continues, take care to inquire whether she is well attended; and do not omit to visit her frequently. Blessed Leonard of Port Maurice remarks, that the superior should not be very condescending to those who, in every little illness, seek particular attention and exemption from the common exercises; for much condescension to them might cause scandal and abuses injurious to general observance.

So much regarding the care of temporalities; but you should pay far greater attention to the spiritual concerns of the monastery. Be careful, then, to see that the spiritual exercises be made every year for eight or ten days in solitude and with devotion; do not spare trouble, or a little expense, in order to procure, according to the best of your ability, a person well qualified to give the meditations and instructions to the religious. Expenditure of this kind contributes far more to the glory of God than the expense of music, of costly ornaments, and repasts. Ask the prelate to procure such a person to give the spiritual exercises. Above all, be careful to provide the religious with an extraordinary confessor (at least twice or three times in the year,) and to make the sisters, if they are unwilling to make their confession to him, at least present themselves before him, as Benedict the Fourteenth has commanded in his bull Pastoralis. Do not wait till any of the nuns ask for an extraordinary confessor: if you do, you will have to answer for all the evils which follow from your neglect. Oh! how great the account which certain superiors shall have to render to God for the neglect of this duty! I entreat you to attend to it. Be careful always to give the extraordinary confessor the information necessary for the direction of the community.

Let us now say a few words on the music and singing of nuns. In itself, singing in the church is good, because it is intended to praise God; but it sometimes happens that, in the singing of nuns, vanity and the devil may have a greater share than God. Some one may ask, what evil there is in singing? I answer, in the first place, that there is a loss of time, and a great loss of time: for music is an art which, if not perfectly learned, not only does not delight, but gives positive displeasure. In the second place, it is an occasion of a thousand distractions, and sometimes of irreverence. Thirdly, it may sometimes be an occasion of losing God; for it may sometimes be necessary to take lessons from men, and perhaps from young men. Do not imagine that I speak in this manner because I am an enemy to music: on the contrary, I am fond of music, and when a secular, I devoted a good deal of time to it (it were better I had devoted it to the love of God.) I do not disapprove of nuns singing the plain chant, nor even the figured chant in concert, in imitation of the plain chant. But I say that it is not at all becoming in a nun to sing alone the figured chant. If the figured chant has not been introduced into your monastery, I entreat you to guard against its introduction. Should it be unfortunately introduced, I entreat you to do everything in your power to abolish it.

Lastly, be careful to give to the lay sisters sufficient time for meditation, for communion, and some other devotions: if you do not, you should not complain that they are disobedient, proud, and without devotion. If you do not give them the opportunity of adopting the means of acquiring devotion, how can you expect them to be devout? I entreat you to recommend those who are in office to read the admonitions which I here subjoin, regarding their duties, that each may know her principal obligation, and the manner of performing them.

Admonitions to the Vicar or Assistant.

1. If you have been elected assistant, know that your office obliges you to a general superintendence of the monastery, and particularly of the lay sisters, and therefore you should frequently visit them, in order to see if they fulfil their duties.

2. Be most affable to all the sisters, and listen to all who come to speak to you. Many nuns feel a reluctance to mention their troubles to the superior, and will have recourse to you. Therefore, when they come give them confidence, that they may freely disclose their inquietudes; and endeavour to provide for their wants according to the best of your ability; and when you cannot comfort them, apply to the superior in their behalf. But do not arrogate to yourself authority which you do not possess: you are the servant of the superior, and should therefore depend on her in all matters of importance.

Admonitions to the Mistress of Novices.

1. The mistress of novices should be a person of great fervour and prudence: for the good of the monastery depends entirely on the education of the novices, who shall have afterwards, in their turn, to govern the community. Many of the admonitions given to the abbess are applicable to you; such as to give an example of all the virtues in which you instruct the novices: not to show partiality to any novice by praising her, keeping her near you, or showing her attention which excites surprise and discontent among her companions; to correct those who commit a fault, correcting with sweetness and without anger. Hence, you would do well to read the admonitions to the abbess (N. 3, 4, 5.) With regard to correction, the mistress of novices should be more rigid than the abbess: you should not overlook any fault without correcting it.

2. Besides the instructions to which I have alluded, there are others peculiar to your office. The first is, to be discreet and not to require too much from young persons, who are but little advanced in spiritual life. You must endeavour to lead them to perfection by degrees, according to the strength which you perceive in them. You should not show partiality, as has been said: but holy prudence requires that all be not treated in the same way. One is timid, and must be treated with great kindness; another is haughty and obstinate, she must be treated with greater rigour. Another is very much under the influence of shame, and may be in danger of concealing a sin in confession: another is too affectionate, and is in danger of forming particular friendships. In these and similar occasions, be careful to remove each of the novices from the danger to which she may be exposed.

3. The second admonition is, not to permit the novices to be familiar with the religious, or with the postulants, much less with each other; be careful, then, not to allow them to wander about the monastery without a companion. Do not permit them to read profane books, or indulge in vanity of dress, or to write useless letters. Blessed Leonard of Port Maurice relates, that in a certain monastery, a young person, by an epistolary correspondence, contracted an intimacy with a young man, which led her into a mortal sin of thought. Through shame she concealed the sin in confession, and was guilty of many sacrileges. She was seized with a mortal disease, and died impenitent. After death she appeared to an uncle, and said to him: "Behold the niece whom you watched over with so much caution; I am damned for a sin of thought which I concealed from my confessor." Be also careful frequently to remind the novices of the eternal maxims, saying, for example: Sooner or later we must die. What shall become of us on the day of judgment? Everything in this world shall have an end. Miserable the soul that is damned. Recommend them frequently to practice devotion to the passion of Jesus Christ, and to his divine mother, if they wish to become saints.

4. Above all, inculcate to the novices the observance of their rules, on which you are bound by your office to instruct them frequently; for, as has been already said, the observance of her rules is the only means by which a religious can become a saint.

Admonitions to the Bursar.

1. It is necessary for you to guard against two extremes, extravagance and excessive parsimony. With regard to the former, be careful not to violate justice, nor to injure the convent by spending more than you ought, in order to gain the esteem of the religious. With regard to the second, do not violate charity towards the nuns, by not attending sufficiently to their wants, in order to gain the name of a good economist, by saving a large sum of money during the time of your office. Be careful to provide for the nuns according to the best of your ability.

2. Be careful also not to omit your devotions, nor to live like a secular, through an excessive solicitude to save for the monastery. It is true that your office obliges you to treat with externs, to keep the accounts, to be sometimes absent from choir, and from the common exercises, but be careful to cut off useless discourses; and, when it can be done without inconvenience, put off till the next day the business which might interfere with meditation, communion, examen of conscience, or spiritual lecture. The monastery does not require that, in order to serve the community, you should lead a life of dissipation.

3. Take care also not to enter into disputes with seculars about the price of their goods, nor with workmen about their wages. You must do these things, not like a worldling, but like a religious. It would be still worse to appropriate to your own use anything which you save by excessive parsimony. Whatsoever you acquire is the property of the monastery; and all that you save by a culpable or blameless thrift, belongs not to you but to the convent.

Admonitions to the Sacristan.

1. Entertain a great esteem for your office, all the duties of which remind you of your spouse. The hosts, the vestments, the sacred vessels, corporals, purificatories, candles, and flowers, remind you of him. You should discharge all your duties with devotion and recollection, frequently renewing your intention of honouring the most holy sacrament. And in passing before the holy Eucharist do not omit to bend the knee with reverence.

2. Be reserved with the chaplains, and still more reserved with persons who serve mass; speak to them only when necessary.

3. Treat your companion with great charity and respect. Be not disturbed when she does anything which you do not approve of; and be still more careful not to yield to any word of anger or complaint. Do what is in your power; and when there is anything to be done which you are unable to do; ask her to assist you, but always in the language of meekness, saying: I pray you to help me, do this act of charity for me, have patience with me, and the like.

4. Be careful, above all things, not to expend, through vanity, more than others have ordinarily expended. I say ordinarily, for you should not follow the example of a person who has been extravagant; for such vanity she shall suffer many years in purgatory (if she escapes hell); and do you wish to be her companion in that place of suffering? I entreat you to read what has been said on this subject, in the chapter on poverty (Chap. 9, sec. 2, n. 7.) Be assured that you shall have to give a great account to God, if you introduce or continue such an abuse, which will be the cause of a thousand sins. Finally, I recommend you, as I have recommended the bursar, not to lead a life of dissipation, in consequence of attending too much to your office. Do all for God, and not for vanity, and everything will go on well.

Admonitions to the Attendant at the Turn, and to the Portress.

1. Be not idle at the turn, or at the door; employ the little moments of time which you have in work, or in reading; or at least in recollection with God, looking occasionally at some sacred image. When you open the door cast down your eyes, if you wish not to expose yourself to a thousand defects and a thousand temptations.

2. Do not (I say) remain idle; but do not neglect the duty of opening the door, and give without delay, the messages to the nuns, as often as it may be necessary. You must, however, take care not to bring them inconvenient messages; nor to call them (without first speaking to the superior) to any person who may wish to speak to them. Offer the trouble and annoyance to God, and it will be more profitable to you than prayer.

3. Be careful to lock the inner as well as the outer doors at the hours prescribed.

Admonitions to the Infirmarian.

1. Your office is one of great importance and of great merit, if you fulfil it as you ought. In order to fulfil your office well be careful to recognize in the sick the person of Jesus Christ, who says that he accepts the aid which we give the sick as given to himself. "I was sick, and you visited me"—Matt. xxv. 36. Hence, you require, in the first place, great charity, in assisting the sick, according to the utmost of your ability. Do not be uneasy if you sometimes lose the sermon, or if you are unable to hear the usual number of masses, or to attend at your other devotions; you will gain far greater merit by assisting one of your sisters in religion. Sympathize with her in her pains, and give her as many bodily comforts as you can; if you are obliged to refuse something, because it would be injurious to her, at least console her by your words. Repeat, from time to time, some spiritual maxim, remind her of the sorrows of Jesus Christ; and should it be agreeable to her, read some spiritual book for her. Be on your guard not to reproach her with being the cause of her illness, by eating to excess, or remaining too long in the garden or on the terrace. Do not show, by your manner or otherwise, that you feel weary of attending her; do not thus add to the pain of an afflicted sister. And when you see that she suffers from head-ache, tell the nuns in the cell to retire, or at least not to raise their voice. Be careful to give her, at the proper time, the medicines prescribed. Should she refuse them, remind her of her obligation to obey the physician, and, should she still refuse, send for the superior, or for some of the religious, who will persuade her to obey.

2. Secondly, be careful to practice humility in attending your sisters in sickness, though they should be the meanest lay sisters in the convent; do not disdain to serve them in all their wants. These are the most noble acts of a religious or of a Christian. Thirdly, you require great patience in attending the sick, during the whole time of their illness and convalescence. Tedious maladies weary the tepid infirmarian, but not the religious who has an ardent love of Jesus Christ. Fourthly, your require great meekness in bearing with a sick sister, who, instead of thanking you, complains of you, and appears incapable of being satisfied with all the services you render her; but you must bear with her, and pity her in her sufferings. There are certain infirmarians who cannot hear a word of complaint from the sick without resenting it. If this be your character, endeavour to give up your office; otherwise you will injure yourself and the sick. A brother of the Society of Jesus used to answer the complaints of the sick by saying: pardon me, for I am stupid; in spite of their complaints he would continue to assist them with the same attention and cheerfulness. You should act in this manner.

3. Be careful not to judge that any sick sister only pretends to be ill; and be still more careful not to say that her illness is only imaginary. On the other hand, when the malady is considered dangerous, do not deceive the sister, but speak plainly to her, and say: my sister, your recovery is not beyond hope, but your disease is mortal; it appears God wishes to call you to paradise. I know that you are prepared, but if you have any scruple do not lose time. I will send for the confessor. The holy sacraments are conducive to the health of the soul and body. We all pray for the restoration of your health: but in the end we must all conform to the will of God. Should your speaking in this manner disturb the sick sister, have patience with her; shall religious be treated like seculars, who are not warned of their danger until their recovery is past hope? a deplorable abuse, which sends many souls to hell. As soon, then, as you hear from the physician that a sick sister is in danger, take care that she be fortified by the sacraments, particularly if you have any suspicion that her conscience is troubled. I say that the infirmarian who fulfils her office as she ought is a source of joy to the monastery, and renders herself the beloved of God.

Admonitions to the Discreets.

1. When your advice is asked, be careful, before you give an answer, to understand well the question proposed: and should you ever find that because it was founded on error, the counsel which you gave was unjust, you are obliged to retract it.

2. Tell freely what you think before God; and in giving your opinion, be not influenced by the consideration that the superior or any other religious who is your friend, thinks the contrary. The rule requires that consultations should be held on matters of importance; that in these consultations each sister may speak her sentiments freely, and that thus the best counsel may be adopted. If you are influenced by human respect, disadvantageous contracts, useless expenditure, unjust punishments, and other evils will be permitted.

3. When you see any serious irregularity in the convent you should inform the superior of it, that she may apply a remedy. But in doing this attend to two things; first, after having done your duty, be not disturbed if the superior does not do what you think ought to be done; secondly, be not too importunate in speaking to the superior on the affairs of the community; you should speak to her only on matters of some importance.

Admonitions to the Lay Sisters.

What is said for the lay sisters may be also useful to those who have the care of instructing and admonishing them. I wish first to say a word to the choir nuns on their conduct towards the lay sisters. You, O choir sister, complain that some of the lay sisters are arrogant, disobedient, indevout, that they injure the property of the monastery, and sometimes give it away to externs. But who, I ask, is the cause of their misdeeds? You are the cause of it. You keep them at work the whole day; you do not give them sufficient time to make mental prayer, to frequent the sacraments, to visit Jesus Christ on the altar, to read or hear a spiritual lecture, or to assist at Mass on week-days; and afterwards you complain that they are imperfect and indevout. How can you expect that they will be fervent in the exercises of piety, if you deprive them of the means of acquiring devotion? Such the manner in which lay sisters are sometimes treated; for such treatment certain nuns will have to give a great account to God. I shall now address the lay sisters.

1. My sister, you should understand that your state is a state of humility, and that it is particularly by humility that you are to become a saint. You should be humble towards all, even your companions, but particularly towards the choir nuns, by endeavouring always to speak to them with great respect, and to serve them as much as you can without neglecting the duties you owe to the community. And should they ever say a disagreeable word, bear it with patience, and be careful not to answer them as if you were their equal. Had you remained in the world, would you dare to answer your mistress as you now answer the nuns? You certainly would not; and why should you, now that you are a religious, forget what you are? You should not be puffed up with vanity because the nuns call you sister, or because you sit at the same table with them; you have come to be a servant, and as such you have been professed; you must then serve, and serve with humility, for to serve with pride is not to serve.

2. Be obedient in the office in which you are placed, and obey without reply and without delay. Do not go about examining whether your companions attend to their work or spend their time in idleness; attend to yourself alone: the more you labour the more merit you will gain before God, if you work with the intention of pleasing him. You will thus merit a greater reward than the nuns who hear many masses, or are employed in spiritual reading, because in all your toils and labours you perfectly fulfil the divine will, and in all this sanctity consists. Do not say, then, that you have come to the convent to serve God and not to be a drudge, for you are to serve God by labouring for the community and by serving the nuns.

3. Be careful, if the superior does not appoint it for you, to ask a little time for mental prayer, for communion, for hearing mass, and visiting the blessed sacrament, etc. And when time is given you for these exercises, be careful not to spend it in idle chat, or, as some do, in going about the monastery. You who are a lay sister must be very avaricious of the time which you are allowed, you must be careful not to lose a single moment of it, for you are obliged to attend to the service of the community. If you do not serve the community, whom will you serve? But, during your work, who can hinder you to be recollected with God? Make frequent acts of love and fervent petitions, saying: my Jesus, mercy: my God, assist me; give me thy love, etc. At least repeat the Hail Mary, or other vocal prayers. Do not say any more that you are abandoned. Seek God and you shall find him. But you must love silence; speak when your business requires to speak, but avoid contention, and cut short all useless discourses. And for that purpose keep at a distance from those who are prone to talk. Avoid particularly the discontented, who sometimes express their discontent in uncharitable language.

4. I recommend to you the practice of holy poverty. I fear that some lay sisters go to hell on account of the violation of the vow of poverty; they are entrusted with the care of the goods of the monastery; if, then, they give them to externs, or neglect to preserve them, how can they expect salvation? Be careful to preserve with the greatest care the things which are given to you in charge; and should others ask them of you, answer with firmness that they are not yours, and that you cannot damn yourself for their sake. If you wish to assist any one through charity, do it with the permission of the superior. Do not make your entrance into religion an occasion of your own damnation.

CHAPTER XXIV.

RULE OF LIFE FOR A RELIGIOUS WHO DESIRES TO BECOME A SAINT.

1.—On rising in the morning.

1. As soon as you hear the signal for rising, imitate the infants who, as soon as they awake, instantly look for milk; the moment you awake, raise your heart to God by an act of love, offer him the actions of the day, and beg of him to assist you. You must, then, according to the advice of St. Teresa, not remain turning in bed, but rise immediately, as if the bed were on fire; otherwise you shall, as I have said in another place, lose the flower of merit. While you are dressing, do not lose your time, but employ it in repeating some ejaculation or prayer, for example: "My God, I wish for you alone, and nothing more. I offer you all that I shall do and suffer during this day. My Jesus, mercy. Lord, assist me always, and make me do your will," etc. You will do well to use such ejaculations in the intervals between your actions, such as in going to choir, or to the refectory, or in the occupations which do not require application of mind. These moments employed in this manner produce great fruit in the course of time.

2. As soon as you are dressed, place yourself before the crucifix, and make the morning acts of thanksgiving, of love, of oblation, of all your actions and prayers during the day. And, above all, ask with fervour help from Jesus and Mary, to serve him well during the day.

2.—On Mental Prayer.

With regard to mental prayer, I do not intend to repeat here what has been already said on this subject in chapter 15 I will only say a few words on the manner of making it. After the three acts—of faith, of the presence of God, of humility, and petition to God for light—always read the point, or listen to another reading it, and then stop to reflect on the sentiment which has made the greatest impression upon you. Afterwards make pious affections towards God, such as acts of thanksgiving, of humiliation, of confidence, and, above all, of contrition and of love, and petitions to God for light and help, for resignation to his will, and for the gift of his love. And when you feel aridity, employ yourself then particularly in praying for God's graces. It will be enough to say and repeat: My Jesus, mercy. My God, assist me. Give, in fine, a glance at your conscience, and see if there is anything in it displeasing to God; remove whatever you find to be offensive to him, and make a particular resolution to correct the fault. Be careful always to make meditation as well in the morning as in the evening. Should you on any day be unable to make your usual meditation, make at least a part of it. Be persuaded that you will never make progress in perfection unless you have a great love for mental prayer.

3.—On the Divine Office.

1. It is necessary to say something on the divine office, as it had not been treated in the body of the work. All men should be continually employed on this earth in thanking the Lord for his benefits, and in asking the graces necessary for the attainment of salvation. But because seculars live in the midst of the distractions arising from worldly concerns, the holy Church wishes that in her name, and in the name of all Christians, ecclesiastics and religious should praise God, and pray for the whole world, by reciting the divine office, which is nothing more than a memorial or petition composed by God himself, that he may the more readily hear our prayers, and relieve our wants. Hence, a hundred private prayers have not as much efficacy as a single petition offered in the divine office. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi used to say, that, in comparison of the divine office, all other prayers are of little merit. Hence, when she heard the bell for the office, she exulted with joy, and giving up every occupation, she ran to the choir, thinking that she was going to perform the office of the angels in praising God, and imploring graces for poor sinners.

St. Catherine felt such joy in reciting the office, that she desired to end her life in chanting the Psalms; and she would say that a nun who persevered till death in reciting the office in the choir, might be ranked among the saints.

2. But it is not enough to say the office; it is necessary to say it as it ought to be said, with reverence and attention. If you say it with distraction, rolling the eyes about on dissipating objects, or what is worse, occasionally smiling and speaking without necessity, know that a severe purgatory is prepared for you in the next life. It is related of two nuns, that for inattention of this kind, they were condemned to severe torments. A Cistercian nun called Gertrude, appeared after death to a companion, and said that she was suffering in purgatory for not having observed silence in reciting the office. St. Antonine relates that a holy father once saw a devil in the choir putting several things into a bag. Being asked what he was doing, the evil spirit answered, that he was laying up all the words and syllables omitted or badly pronounced by the religious, in order to charge them with their inattention at the judgment seat of God. In the life of St. Lutgarde we read, that God sent a plague into a convent of nuns in punishment of the negligent manner in which they recited the office.

3. Prayer made with attention is an odoriferous incense which is very pleasing to God, and obtains treasures of graces. But, on the other hand, prayer made without devotion and with distraction is a fetid smoke, which provokes the divine wrath; for God himself said to St. Bridget, that they who recite the divine office negligently, dishonour him more than they glorify him. Hence, St. Thomas says, that he who prays with voluntary distraction (though the prayer be not of obligation,) is not exempt from sin, for he appears to treat God with contempt, just as a person who speaks to others without attending to what he says, is guilty of disrespect towards them—(2, 2, q. 83, a. 12.)

4. In the Cistercian chronicles we find an account of the celebrated vision which St. Bernard had one night while he chanted the Psalms in choir along with his monks. At the right hand of each monk he saw an angel writing: some of the angels wrote in letters of gold, others in letters of silver; some wrote with ink, others with water; others, in fine, held the pen in the hand without writing at all. Our Lord afterwards gave the saint to understand, that the letters of gold signified the fervour with which some of the monks recited the office; the letters of silver represented prayers said with devotion, but with less fervour; the letters of ink denoted attention to the pronunciation of the words, without devotion; and the letters of water indicated the negligence of those who were distracted, and paid but little attention to the words which they pronounced with the tongue. Finally, the angels who were not writing at all, denoted the irreverence of those who were voluntarily distracted.

5. I hope, blessed sister, that you are not one of those who, in saying the office, are voluntarily distracted. A person is understood to be voluntarily distracted when, after adverting to the thought which distracts him, he attends to it, although he sees that it takes away his attention from the office. Be careful henceforth to recite the office with proper attention. You go through the labour of reciting the office, and will you, for the sake of avoiding the little trouble or exertion necessary to say it with due attention, voluntarily lose the merit of it, and render yourself deserving of punishment? Adopt, then, the following method: when you enter the choir, after blessing yourself with holy water, first adore the most holy sacrament, offer to the honour of Jesus Christ the office you are going to recite, ask his assistance, and then go to your place, and imagine that the Lord is looking at you from heaven, that his ears are attentive to the prayers you recite, and that the angels are present to offer your petitions to God. While the religious were one day reciting matins, blessed Ermani saw a multitude of angels with golden thuribles in their hands, offering to God the prayers of the religious.

6. Be not disturbed at the distractions you suffer in the office; as long as they are not voluntary they are not sinful. God compassionates the misery of our nature. Thoughts frequently enter the mind without being wilful, and when not wilful, they are not displeasing to God. St. Thomas says that even souls wrapt in contemplation cannot remain long on high, but are drawn down by the weight of human misery to involuntary distraction. Endeavour not only in the beginning, but also during the course of the office, to renew your attention from time to time, such as at the beginning of each psalm. You already know that, according to St. Thomas and the generality of divines, there are three kinds of attention to the office: to the words, to the sense, and to God. To the words, by endeavouring to pronounce them distinctly. To the sense, by attending to the signification of the words. To God, by adoring him, loving him, and asking his graces. Any of the three is sufficient for the fulfilment of the obligation of saying the office; but he who recites it merely with attention to the words, without attention to the sense or to God, will never say it with devotion or fruit. Endeavour, then, to excite in your heart the sentiments you read. It is true that many passages of the Psalms are obscure, but many of them are also clear, and are full of petitions, of affections of love, of confidence, and contrition.

7. The most perfect kind of attention is attention to God; and in order to practice this kind of attention, it will be particularly useful to meditate, during the different parts of the office, on different circumstances of the passion. For example, during the first nocturn, you can meditate on the washing of the feet; during the second, on the institution of the most holy sacrament; and during the third, on the prayer of our Lord in the garden. During lauds, on his capture, and on the maltreatment which he received in the house of Caiphas; during prime, on his scourging; during terce, on the crowning with thorns; during sext, on the journey to Calvary; at none, on the three hours which Jesus remained hanging on the cross; at vespers, on his death; and during complin, on his burial. But the meditations should not be so profound, nor be made with such application of the mind as to fatigue the head. They should be made with sweetness, so that the mind may be assisted with holy thoughts, and may at the same time attend in some manner to the words recited by the other side of choir. Every time you say the Pater noster, apply the heart in a special manner to the words, sanctificetur nomen tuum, by which you mean to say, Lord, make thyself known and loved by all. Adveniat regnum tuum; Fiat voluntas tua sicut in cœlo et in terra; grant that thy will may be done on earth as the saints do it in heaven. In saying the Gloria Patri, you can make different affections; of faith, of thanksgiving, of complacency in the felicity of God, and of desire to honour him, and to suffer for his glory. St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi, in saying the Gloria Patri, always bowed down her head, intending to offer it to the executioner in honour of the faith; and she sometimes made this act with such fervour, that she became pale, as if she felt that her head was about to be cut off. In repeating the Ave Maria so often in the office, you can obtain many graces through this divine Mother. Behold the manner of reciting the divine praises with devotion, and with great advantage to yourself.

8. Some nuns esteem and call the divine office a great burden, and I say that they who say it without devotion, and with an anxious desire to finish it soon, have reason to call it so. For they have to toil for two hours, or at least for an hour and a-half, in reciting it without relish, and with great pain. But to good religious, who say the office with devotion, offering to God holy affections, and petitions, it gives spiritual delight; and if it be called a burden, it is, as has been said in another place, the burden of the wings which raise the soul to God, and unite her more closely to him.

9. For the instruction of nuns, and to relieve them from uneasiness of conscience, I will here subjoin the privileges which have been granted to them by the Sovereign Pontiffs. First, Clement VII. granted to all religious who are sick, and to the infirmarians, the privilege of being able to satisfy the obligation of the divine office by saying six or seven Psalms assigned by the superior, along with seven Paters and two Credos. Martin V. granted to religious who are in a state of convalescence the privilege of fulfilling the obligation of the office by reciting that part of it which their confessor may assign. Observe that by the sick I mean those who labour under an infirmity, which of itself would not excuse them from the office. Observe also that privileges granted to religious of the male sex are also granted to nuns; for what is granted to the former is understood to be granted to the latter, in all that is accommodated to them, and reciprocally. Secondly, Leo X. granted permission to religious to anticipate the long offices, and to reserve the short offices for days on which they shall be more busily employed. Thirdly, Innocent IV. granted to the nuns of St. Clare (and through them to all nuns who have enclosure, for they all partake of each other's privileges,) permission to comply with the divine office by reciting the office of lay sisters when there is any reasonable cause, such as when they are tormented with scruples, or greatly fatigued, or when they were employed for the greater part of the day in useful occupations, or when, in the opinion of the superior or confessor, they are not as yet well instructed in the office of the choir nuns; and nuns can avail themselves of privilege without permission of the superior, because it was granted absolutely and without any condition.

1. In order to hear mass with devotion, it is necessary to know that the sacrifice of the altar is the same as that which was once offered on Calvary, with this difference, that on Calvary the blood of Jesus Christ was really shed, but on the altar it is shed only in a mystical manner. Had you been present on Calvary, with what devotion and tenderness would you have assisted at that great sacrifice! Enliven your faith, then, and consider that the same action is performed on the altar, and that the same sacrifice is offered not only by the priest, but also by all who assist at mass. Thus, all perform, in a certain manner, the office of priest during the celebration of the mass, in which the merits of the passion of our Saviour are applied to us in a particular manner.

2. It is, moreover, necessary to know that the sacrifice of the mass has been instituted for four ends. First, to honour God; secondly, to satisfy for our sins; thirdly, to thank God for His benefits; fourthly, to obtain the divine graces. Behold, then, a method of hearing mass with great fruit. First, by the oblation of the person of Jesus Christ, God and man, to the Eternal Father, we give to God infinite honour—we give him greater honour than he would receive from the oblation of the lives of all men and all angels. Secondly, by the oblation of Jesus Christ in the mass, we offer to God a complete satisfaction for all the sins of men, and especially for the sins of those who assist at mass; to whom is applied the same divine blood by which the human race was redeemed on Calvary. Thus, by each mass more satisfaction is made to God than by any other expiatory work. But although the mass is of infinite value, God accepts it only in a finite manner, according to the dispositions of those who assist at the holy sacrifice; and, therefore, it is usual to hear several masses. Thirdly, in the mass we render to God an adequate thanksgiving for all the benefits he has bestowed upon us. Fourthly, during the mass we can obtain all the graces we desire for ourselves and for others. We are unworthy of receiving any grace from God, but Jesus Christ has given us the means of obtaining all graces, if, while we offer him to God in the mass, we ask them of the eternal Father in his name, for then Jesus himself unites with us in prayer. If you knew that while you pray to the Lord, the divine Mother, along with all paradise, united with you, with what confidence would you pray? Now, when you ask of God any grace during the mass, Jesus (whose prayers are more efficacious than the prayers of all heaven together) prays for you, and offers in your behalf the merits of his passion.

3. You will do well, then, to divide the mass into four parts. In the first, that is, from the beginning to the Gospel, offer the sacrifice of the mass to honour God, saying: My God, I adore Thy Majesty; I would wish to honour thee as much as thou deservest; but what honour can I, a miserable sinner, give thee? I offer thee the honour which Jesus renders to you on this altar. In the second part, from the Gospel to the Elevation, offer the sacrifice in satisfaction for your sins, saying: Lord, I detest above every evil all the offences I have given thee; I am sorry for them above all things, and in satisfaction for them I offer thy Son, who sacrifices himself for us on this altar, and through his merits I pray thee to pardon me, and to give me holy perseverance In the third part, from the Elevation to the Communion, offer Jesus to the Eternal Father in thanksgiving for all the graces which he has bestowed upon you, saying: Lord, I am unable to thank thee; I offer thee the blood of Jesus Christ in this mass, and in all the masses which are at this moment celebrated throughout the world. In the fourth part, from the Communion to the end, you will ask with confidence the graces which you stand in need of, and particularly sorrow for your sins, the gift of perseverance, and of the divine love; and you will recommend to God, in a special manner, your sisters in religion, poor sinners, and the souls in purgatory. Every mass heard in this manner will obtain for you a treasure of merits. Should you be permitted to lay out any money, procure masses to be celebrated in your church, as well for your own benefit as to give the nuns an opportunity of hearing them.

With regard to confession and communion, enough has been said in chapter 18.

5.—On the Refectory.

1. Would to God that some nuns did not, by their intemperance and want of reserve in the refectory, lose all they had gained in their spiritual exercises. You can practice many virtues in the refectory. First, obedience, by going to meals the instant you hear the signal, in order to be present at the benediction. Secondly, purity of intention, by intending to take your meals, not for your own satisfaction, but to do the will of God, who wishes you to support the body, that it may help you to serve him on this earth. But before you begin to take food beg of God the grace not to exceed the bounds of necessity. Thirdly, mortification, by abstaining from something, or leaving a part of what pleases you most, or at least by contenting yourself with what you receive from the community, and not seeking for anything particular, nor complaining that what you get is not well dressed, or not properly seasoned. Endeavour also to perform some mortification at table, particularly during novenas, and on Fridays and Saturdays, by eating on your knees, or sitting on the floor; be not disturbed if others laugh at you, for then your merit shall be increased. Fourthly, modesty of the eyes, by keeping them cast down, not looking about to observe what your companions are doing or eating. Fifthly, silence, which is so necessary in the refectory. Be careful, then, to attend to what is read. It is a delightful thing to nourish the soul with the pious sentiments which are read, while the body is nourished with food. By attending to the lecture you will also avoid the faults which are committed by the indulgence of the appetite. Read chapter 8, section 2, on the mortification of the taste.

6.—On Recreation.

1. It is the will of God that they who love him should take recreation from time to time, in order to unbend the bow. "Be glad in the Lord," said David: "and rejoice ye just"—Ps. xxx. 11. But he says, in the Lord; which implies, that in recreation there should be moderation and modesty. Moderation, because when too long recreation will not be free from defects; hence, the moment the time fixed by rule is expired you should be silent, and retire. Do not imitate some, who wish to finish the discourse which has been introduced, and thus spend time unprofitably. St. Jane Chantal used to say: "If I threw away a moment of time I would consider myself a robber before God. Perhaps the time is mine, so that I can spend it as I please? God has given to me in measure, and will demand an account of every moment." Recreation must also be modest; which implies, first, that you abstain from self-praise, from detraction, and from certain jests which are painful to your companions, and also from interrupting others when they speak. Secondly, modesty implies that you abstain from speaking in a very loud tone, and also from immoderate laughter. I say immoderate laughter; for, as St. Francis de Sales writes, as it is an irregularity to laugh during serious occupation, so it is very painful never to laugh at recreation. Hence, his disciple, St. Jane Chantal, used to say: "When I am among our young religious I laugh, in order to encourage them to enjoy the recreation; for this is necessary." Thirdly, modesty implies that you abstain from contending with any one, from speakink of things of the world, such as marriages, festivities, splendid dresses, etc. St. John of the Cross used to say, that to speak of these worldly trifles cannot be free from all fault.

2. I do not say that during recreation you should always speak on serious topics. Laugh, amuse yourself, speak even on entertaining subjects, but preserve recollection, by interiorly making occasional acts of the love of God, or petitions for his graces. Frequently introduce discourses on God, endeavouring to draw spiritual good from conversations which are indifferent. Imitate St. Lewis Gonzaga, who thus converted the recreation hall into a sanctuary; for the students sometimes went from recreation more fervent than from meditation. I pray you read on this subject what I have written in chapter 8, section 1, on modesty. Abstain also from all particular attention to those for whom you may feel a preference; if you do not, you will give displeasure to others, and derange the whole recreation. Be equally free with all, even with those whose dispositions may be least pleasing to you, and imitate St. Teresa, by conversing more with them than with the others.

3. But what shall we say of recreations which are practiced in certain monasteries during the carnival, when some of the common exercises are allowed to be performed in private, the good order of the community and the rule of silence are not observed, and the nuns spend a part of the day and night in dancing, singing profane songs, and other worldly amusements? I know not how the superior can permit such irregularities without grievous scruples of conscience. O God, instead of thinking of worldly amusements, religious should then more than ever remain before Jesus Christ in the blessed sacrament, or in their cell, at the foot of the crucifix, to bewail the many offences with which seculars insult him. Religious who seek such amusements do not love Jesus Christ. During the carnival, St. Mary Magdalene de Pazzi watched entire nights, praying for sinners. How pleasing to Jesus Christ are the prayers of his spouses, who seek to console him at the time when he is most abandoned by the world! Our Lord gave St. Gertrude to understand that he rewards with special graces the acts of virtue which are offered to him during the carnival. And while St. Catherine of Sienna was praying to him during the carnival, our Lord called her his spouse, in return for the homage which she offered to him at a time when so many insults were offered to him.

4. But if, during that time, you wish to indulge in amusement, amuse yourself in a manner becoming a religious. If you wish to sing, sing spiritual songs; but take care never on any account to dance. If you are invited to take part in any little opera, avoid it as much as possible; for it will at least cause a loss of time and great dissipation; and refuse absolutely unless the opera be altogether sacred; or if it should be necessary to put on a secular dress, refuse, even though you should be upbraided with incivility, with a want of education, or hypocrisy. Others may reproach you, but God will praise you. "Maledicent illi et tu benedices"—Ps. cviii. 28. Be careful not to omit your spiritual lecture on any day. Enough has been said on this subject in chapter 17. Make your visit to the most holy sacrament; read chapter 18, section 2, n. 22, etc. Attend also to your work; see chapter 16, section 2. You should never omit to say at least five decades of the Rosary. Read chapter 21, n. 12.

1. A religious should make two examens in the day: the general and particular examen. The general examen is made in the evening, the particular is made in the morning before dinner, on some particular defect into which a person falls more frequently. Worldly spouses remain for several hours before the glass; the spouse of Jesus Christ should, at least twice in the day, place herself in the presence of God, in order to cleanse the soul. With regard to the practice of these examens, the particular is short, for in it a person only gives a glance at the predominant failing, and makes a short act of sorrow. The general examen should be longer. In making it, first ask light of God to enable you to discover the faults you have committed. Then call to mind the actions of the day, and examine whether you have fallen into any defect, such as sloth in rising in the morning, or in obeying any of the calls of the bell; impatience, vanity, in wishing to be seen by others, words of disrespect to companions, idle or uncharitable words, lies of excuse, intemperance in eating, voluntary distractions at prayer, or at the office, looks of curiosity, loss of time, omission of good works, little detractions, want of respect to superiors, defects against poverty, etc. But when you commit any fault, do not wait till evening to make an act of contrition; make it immediately, and then remain in peace. Be comforted when you feel punctures of remorse for your faults, for they are a good sign; they are a sign that you have a horror of your defects. Woe to the nun that is not afraid of light faults; she is in danger of falling into grievous transgressions.

2. After the examen make acts of faith, hope, and charity. I here subjoin short acts of these virtues for your convenience: My God, because thou hast revealed them to thy holy Church, I believe all the truths which she proposes to our belief. I believe that thou art a just remunerator, that thou dost reward the saints with heaven, and punish the wicked in hell. I believe the mystery of the Most Holy Trinity. I believe the incarnation and death of Jesus Christ, and all the other articles which the Church believes. Trusting in thy promises, I hope, through the merits of Jesus Christ, to obtain from thee, because thou art powerful, faithful, and merciful, the pardon of my sins, holy perseverance, and the glory of paradise. And because thou art infinite goodness, I love thee above all things, and I repent of all the offences which I have offered to thee. With the aid of thy grace, which I ask for this moment and for my whole life, I purpose to die rather than ever more offend thee. I also purpose to receive the holy sacraments during life and at my death. You should know that Benedict XIV. has granted an indulgence of many years to all the faithful as often as they say these acts, and a plenary indulgence to those who continue to say them every day for a month.

3. After these acts say your usual prayers to St. Joseph, to your angel guardian, to your holy advocates, along with the Litany of most holy Mary, which you should never omit. Go, then, to take the necessary repose. The devil tempts some nuns to spend a part of the night in prayer, in order to deprive them of the entire of the following day. One day St. Francis could not sleep, but after making the sign of the cross on his pillow, he saw the tempter going away. He then said to his companion: "Brother, this devil wished to prevent me from sleeping, that I might be unable to pray on to-morrow." Take, then, the repose that is necessary for you. In taking off the habits, kiss them; and, in undressing, be careful to practice the greatest possible modesty. Sprinkle the bed with holy water. Before going to sleep say: "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit;" intending that every breath you draw during your repose may be an act of divine love; let your last words be: "My Jesus, I wish for thee, and for nothing else."

4. Be careful to make all your novenas with devotion, such as the novenas of Christmas, of Pentecost, of the seven festivals of Mary, of your holy advocate, along with the devout exercises and the mortifications which your confessor will prescribe. But during these novenas endeavour to employ yourself in acts of love and in visits to the blessed sacrament, and to an image of the blessed mother, more than in vocal prayers. Be careful, also, to make, every month, a day's retreat, spending the entire day in mental prayer, thanksgiving after communion, spiritual lectures, etc., and rigorous silence. A day's retreat contributes greatly to preserve and increase fervour. I also recommend you, in addition to the spiritual exercises which are made in common, to make the spiritual exercises for eight or ten days in private. For this purpose you may use the meditations which I have published in a volume on the Eternal Maxims; they are very short and useful.

5. The virtues which you should be most careful to practice in the monastery, are meekness and obedience. Meekness in bearing affronts; a person living in a community who is unwilling to bear affronts, can never advance in the way of God. Obedience, in promptly executing what the rules prescribe, and what the superiors direct. Do not listen to any one who proposes a maxim which savours little of obedience. St. Teresa used to say: If principles opposed to obedience are to be instilled into religious, it would be better there were neither nuns nor convents. Do not begin to examine whether the superior, in giving you any direction, was influenced by passion; it is the will of God that you obey; or if you are unwilling to obey, do not speak either of perfection, or of the love of God. You already know that all sanctity consists in submitting your will to the will of your superiors.

8.—A religious should banish melancholy. What ought a person to do who finds that she has become a nun against her inclination?

1. It is necessary to avoid melancholy, which is the pest of devotion, and the source of a thousand faults. As long as you are disturbed you will always fall into many defects, you will do no good, and almost all your prayers, meditations, communions, lectures, and other exercises, will be unprofitable, because they will be performed badly, and with a thousand distractions. Remember that all your inquietude and troubles arise from not accepting crosses with resignation from the hand of God. The will of God renders all tribulations sweet and amiable. Read what has been said in the fourteenth chapter, n. 8, etc. You complain that you are infirm, despised, persecuted, and in aridity; unite yourself to the divine will, and these sufferings will be no longer painful to you. If you tell me that you are not so much tormented by these external crosses as by the interior scruples of conscience, and by fears of being in enmity with God, I answer that your confessor has (as I suppose) already ordered you to speak no more of your past life. By the grace of God you abhor your past sins; you are resolved to die rather than commit even a deliberate venial sin; you frequent the sacraments, and seek to belong entirely to God. All these are signs that you enjoy his grace and friendship. Why, then, are you disturbed? Why do you say—Who knows how I stand before God? How shall I die? Have I confessed all my sins? Is my confessor deceived? The devil tells me I shall be damned. Behold the usual tales of scrupulous nuns. Ah! abandon yourself into the arms of divine mercy, and say in peace: Lord, I obey thy minister, and thus I hope in thy blood to be saved, and never to lose thy grace.

2. With regard to the present, I hope, if you are troubled in mind, that you have no attachment to the venial faults which you daily commit, and that they are not fully deliberate; detest them as soon as you perceive them, and then remain tranquil. But, Father, my greatest troubles arise from doubts of consenting to grievous sins, when I am assailed by bad thoughts. I have already spoken on this subject, in the 18th chapter, sec. 2. I here briefly repeat that of a timorous conscience, when he is not certain of having fallen into mortal sin, should remain certain of being in a state of grace; because it is impossible for him, whose will is confirmed in good purposes, to revolt against God without having a clear knowledge of his consent. When your confessor tells you to disregard these fears, and to go to communion without confession, obey him blindly, and do not listen to the devil, who seeks to disturb you with scruples, in order to make you abandon the way of perfection. When you feel agitated, say to the Lord: My Father, I leave my soul in thy hand: if it please thee that this cross should continue till death, I am content; do not permit me to offend thee, make me to love thee, and I do not refuse to suffer as much as thou pleasest. St. Francis de Sales says, that God loves with a tender love the souls that thus abandon themselves to his paternal bosom, leaving themselves to be governed by his divine providence; for he will make all things co-operate to their good, helping these chosen souls to follow him with the will, without any other support than that of his divine pleasure.

3. But, perhaps you will tell me you can never have peace because you find that you have entered religion to please your parents, and against your own will. I answer thus: If, at the time of your profession, you had not a vocation, I would not have advised you to make the vows of religious; but I have entreated you to suspend your resolution of going back to the world, and casting yourself into the many dangers of perdition which are found in the world. I now see you placed in the house of God, and made (either voluntarily or unwillingly) the spouse of Jesus Christ. For my part, I cannot pity you more than I could pity a person who had been transported (even against his will) from a place infected with pestilence, and surrounded by enemies, to a healthful country, to be placed there for life, secure against every foe.

5. I add: grant that what you state is true: now that you are professed in a convent, and that it is impossible for you to leave it, tell me what do you wish to do? If you entered religion against your inclinations, you must now remain with cheerfulness. If you abandon yourself to melancholy, you will lead a life of misery, and will expose yourself to great danger of suffering a hell here, and another hereafter. You must, then, make a virtue of necessity. And if the devil has brought you into religion for your destruction, let it be your care to avail yourself of your holy state for your salvation, and to become a saint. Give yourself to God from the heart, and I assure you that by so doing you will become more content than all the princesses and queens of this world. Being asked his opinion regarding a person who had become a nun against her will, St. Francis de Sales answered: It is true that this child, if she had not been obliged by her parents, would not have left the world; but this is of little importance, provided she knows that the force employed by her parents is more useful to her than the permission to follow her own will. For now she can say: If I had not lost such liberty, I would have lost true liberty. The saint meant to say, that had she not been compelled by her parents to become a nun, her liberty, which would have induced her to remain in the world, would have robbed her of the true liberty of the children of God, which consists in freedom from the chains and dangers of the world.

5. You may say in reply: but how can I be content, if I have not been called to religion? But what does it matter that you have not had a vocation from the beginning? Although you have not become a nun in obedience to a divine call, it is certain that God has permitted your profession for your welfare: and if he did not call you then, he certainly calls you now to be his without reserve. St. Paul, the first hermit, went into the desert, not to remain in it, but to fly from the persecution which was then carried on against the Church; but he was afterwards called by God to remain in the desert: he remained, and became a saint. When St. Teresa first entered into a monastery, she entered not without reluctance; she said that in leaving her father's house, the pain which she felt was so great that she thought it equal to the pain which she should suffer at death; and in her life it is related that she took the habit, as it were by force. But after all she became a great saint, and the reformer of the Carmelite Order

6. Blessed Hyacintha Marescotti, a religious of the convent of St. Clare in Viterbo, was also induced to take the sacred veil against her inclination, and for ten years led a very imperfect life. But being one day illuminated with a divine light, she gave herself entirely to God, and persevered till death, for the space of twenty-four years, in a life of holiness, so that she has deserved to be venerated on the altar. Likewise sister Mary Bonaventure, a nun in the convent of the Torre Dei Specchi, entered against her will; but after a life of tepidity and dissipation, she went during the first meditation of the spiritual exercises, and threw herself at the feet of Father Lancizio, of the Society of Jesus, and courageously said to him: Father, I have learned what God wishes for me. "I wish to be a saint, and a great saint, and I wish to be one immediately." And by the divine aid she executed her purpose: so abundant were her tears that she could say no more; but she went to her cell, and at the foot of the crucifix wrote the following protestation. I, Mary Bonaventure, this day, in the beginning of the spiritual exercises, offer myself entirely to thee, O my Jesus. Accept, O most loving Redeemer, this paper bathed in my tears, which I consecrate to thee as the pledge of my love. I leave it in the wound of thy side, that through the merits of thy blood thou mayest pardon my sin, and establish me in thy love, so that I may be no longer mine, and may be all thine. It is in this manner you must act: resolve this moment to belong entirely to God, and make the same protestation before the blessed sacrament, or at the foot of the crucifix, and doubt not but if you are resolute in your determination the Lord will stretch forth his hand to raise you to a high degree of sanctity. Thus your misfortune (as you call it) will be a source of the greatest happiness, as it was to sister Bonaventure, who, in a short time, became a saint. She survived her conversion only a year, but she died rich in merits; for during that year all her time was spent in meditations and works of penance; and she expired in celestial peace, and immediately after death there were manifest signs of her admission to glory. Have courage, then, and rejoice, now that God calls you to his perfect love, and say, I know, O Lord, that thou dost wish me entirely for thyself: love which is divided is not true love.

7. But remember that to become a saint, desires are not sufficient; it is necessary to put the hand to the work. Begin to make a little more mental prayer, make a spiritual lecture every day, a visit to the holy sacrament, and to an image of Mary. When reproved, be humble; when despised, be silent; cut off all correspondence; begin to mortify the appetite, curiosity, and self-will. Be not diffident, but begin the work, and by degrees you will succeed. Self-love will live in us as long as we shall have life, and, therefore, we must constantly endeavour to cut down the noxious plants which spring up in our garden. To become a saint without trouble is impossible.

It would be useful for religious to read this abstract on the day of retreat, in order to see in what virtue they fail.

1. To desire always to advance in the love of Jesus Christ. Holy desires are the wings with which souls fly to God. Hence, it is necessary to meditate frequently on the passion of our Lord. To make frequent acts of the love of Jesus Christ during the day, beginning as soon as you awake in the morning, and endeavouring to fall asleep, making an act of love. And always to ask of Jesus Christ his holy love.

2. To go to communion as often as possible, with the permission of your director. And during the day to make several spiritual communions—at least three.

3. To visit the most holy sacrament at least once in the day; and in the visit to ask perseverance and holy love, after the acts of faith, thanksgiving, and love. And when you meet with troubles, losses, affronts, or any other cross, have recourse to the most holy sacrament, from the place in which you find yourself at the time.

4. Every morning, at rising, to offer yourself to suffer in peace all the crosses which shall happen during the day, and when they happen, always to say: Lord, thy will be always done.

5. To rejoice in the infinite happiness of God. She that loves God more than herself, ought to rejoice in his felicity more than in her own.

6. To desire paradise, and, therefore, to desire death, in order to be delivered from the danger of losing God, and to go to love him for eternity, and with all your strength.

7. To desire, and to labour that all may love Jesus Christ; and, therefore, to speak frequently to the sisters of the love of Jesus Christ.

8. To treat God without reserve, not refusing him anything which you know to be pleasing to him, and even to choose what is most pleasing to him.

9. To pray every day for the souls in purgatory, and for poor sinners.

10. To perform all your actions through the sole motive of giving pleasure to Jesus Christ, saying, at the beginning of each action, Lord, may this may be entirely for thee.

11. To offer yourself several times in the day to suffer every pain for his sake, saying: My Jesus, I give myself entirely to thee: here I am, do with me whatsoever thou pleasest.

12. To resolve to die rather than commit a deliberate venial sin.

13. To abstain from even lawful gratifications, at least two or three times in the day.

14. To spend two hours, or at least an hour every day, in mental prayer.

15. To love solitude and silence, in order to converse alone with God: hence, it is necessary to love the choir and the cell, and to shun the grate, the door, and the terrace.

16. To perform all the exterior mortifications which you are allowed by obedience, but to attend particularly to interior mortifications; such as not to indulge curiosity, to be silent when you receive an affront, and never to do anything through self-satisfaction.

17. To perform every spiritual exercise as if it were the last time you would perform it; and on that account to think frequently on death in your meditations. And when you are in bed, consider that there you shall one day breathe your last.

18. Not to abandon your usual devotions, or any other good work, through human respect, through aridity, or tediousness.

19. Not to complain in sickness of the inattention of the physicians, or of the sisters, and to endeavour to conceal your pains, except when it is necessary to mention them to the physician.

20. To banish melancholy, preserving tranquillity, and a uniform serenity of countenance in all crosses. He who wishes what God wishes, should never be afflicted.

21. In temptations to have recourse instantly, and with confidence, to Jesus and Mary, and to continue constantly to repeat the names of Jesus and Mary as long as the temptation lasts.

22. To place all your confidence, first, in the passion of Christ, and then, in the intercession of Mary, and to ask every day this confidence from God.

23. After a fault, never to give way to disturbance of mind, or to diffidence, even though you should relapse several times into the same fault; but instantly to repent of it, and trusting in God, to renew your resolution to correct it.

24. To render good to all who treat you badly, at least by praying to God for them.

25. To answer with meekness all who offend you by acts or words, and thus to gain them to God.

26. When you are disturbed, you will do well to remain silent until the mind is composed; otherwise you will commit a thousand faults without perceiving them.

27. In correcting others, endeavour to select a time when neither you, nor the person to be corrected, are disturbed; otherwise the correction will do more harm than good.

28. Always to speak well of others, and to excuse the intention when you cannot excuse the action.

29. To assist others to the best of your ability, and particularly those who are opposed to you.

30. Neither to say nor to do anything disagreeable to others, unless when it is more pleasing to God that you should say or do it. And when you sometimes fail in charity to your neighbour, to ask pardon, or at least to speak to the persons with kindness, and always to speak with meekness, and in a low tone.

31. To offer to God the affronts which you receive, and not to complain of them to others.

32. To observe punctually the rule of the monastery. St. Francis de Sales used to say that the most austere penance of a religious is to deny self-will, and to be content that the observance of rule by the priest that every moment offers such a sacrifice to God. He would frequently say that the predestination of religious is annexed to the love of their rules. And to superiors he used to say, that to fulfil their office, they should do nothing else than observe the rule, and make it be observed by others.

33. To regard every superior as the person of Jesus Christ, and therefore to obey them punctually and without reply.

34. To love the most lowly offices. To select the poorest things. To humble yourself even to inferior sisters. Not to speak of yourself either well or ill: for speaking ill of yourself sometimes foments pride. Not to excuse yourself when reproved, nor even when you are calumniated, unless it is absolutely necessary to excuse yourself, in order to prevent scandal to others.

35. To visit the sick, and to assist them according to the best of your ability, particularly those who are abandoned.

36. To say frequently to yourself: I have come to the convent, not to indulge in pleasure, but to suffer: not to lead a life of comfort, but of poverty; not to be honoured, but to be despised; not to do my own will, but the will of others.

37. To renew always the purpose to become a saint, and not to lose courage in any state of tepidity in which you may find yourself.

38. To renew every day the vows of your profession.

39. To conform to the divine will in all things opposed to the senses in sorrows, infirmities, affronts, contradiction, losses of property, death of relatives or of persons who are dear to you. And to direct all your actions, communions, and other prayers to that end, always asking of God to make you love him, and fulfil his holy will in all things.

40. To recommend yourself to the prayers of other devout persons; but to recommend yourself more to the saints in heaven, and particularly to most holy Mary, setting a great value on the devotion of this divine mother, and endeavouring to infuse it into others.

FAMILIAR DISCOURSE TO A YOUNG PERSON TAKING THE RELIGIOUS HABIT.

BY ST. ALPHONSUS.

Devout sister, of this day on which you have the happiness of being espoused to Jesus Christ, you should preserve a continual remembrance, in order to thank him unceasingly for so great a favour. Do not imagine that Jesus Christ should be under any obligation to you for having left the world for the love of him; you ought to feel an eternal obligation to him for the grace by which he has called you to forsake the world.

You, this day, renounce the world; perhaps you think that in quitting it you make a great sacrifice? What is the world? A land of thorns, and tears, and of pains. It promises great things to its followers, it promises amusements, pleasures, and peace; but they are illusions, bitterness, and vanities. Its very riches, honours, and amusements in the end become an occasion of pain and mourning. "Mourning taketh hold of the end of joy"—Prov. xix. 13. God grant that for so many blind Christians, who love the world, this mourning may not be eternal; in the world there are many great and inevitable dangers of losing our souls, heaven, and God.

How deplorable the condition of those who, deluded by its false promises, forsake Jesus Christ, and go into the world! They expect to find pleasures and happiness, but unhappy souls, they find nothing there, as experience demonstrates, but gall and thorns. The subjection to husbands, the care of children and servants, human respects, the wants of the family, and the control to which all seculars are subject, form a tempest so full of anguish, fears, and discontent, as to render the life of many almost a continual martyrdom.

Ask married women, and try how many can you find happy and content. How many have I found discontented and full of woes! On the other hand ask nuns who have left the world for God, and who wish for nothing but God, if they are satisfied with their state, and they will tell you that they continually thank God for having drawn them away from the world. True, indeed, are the words of Cardinal Petrucci, that the delights of the lovers of the world have the appearance of joys, and are only torments; and on the other hand, the sufferings of them who love God appear to be torments, but they are joys.

So much for the present life; but in the next life, what will be the lot of those who have left the world, and of those who remain in it and love it? Can we not, you will say, become saints, even in the world? My child, attend to what I say, that the devil may not hereafter disturb your peace of mind. To become a saint, it is not enough to say that you will become a saint, nor to desire to become a saint; it is necessary to adopt the means of becoming a saint. It is necessary to make mental prayer every day, because they who do not think often of God scarcely love God. It is necessary to frequent the sacraments, by which God communicates himself to our souls. It is necessary to be perfectly detached from earthly affections, and from all worldly vanities. But how much mental prayer can mothers of a family make, when their heads are full of cares and anxiety about their children, servants, and the necessities of the house? They scarcely have time to say the rosary. How can they frequent the sacraments, when it is almost with difficulty that some of them can go to church to hear mass on festivals? How can they live in perfect disengagement from worldly affections, when they live in the midst of the world? Then I may be asked, is it not possible for a married woman to become a saint? Yes, a married woman may, even in the midst of the world, may become a saint, provided she endeavours, to the best of her ability, to practice the devout exercises mentioned above. But it is, above all—necessary to provide herself with great patience, for it is only with great difficulty and labour that she can become a saint. I say that married persons, who become saints, though they be ladies of rank, princesses, or queens, must be martyrs of patience.

But, on the other hand, how many helps and facilities to lead a regular and saintly life has the religious who leaves the world and gives herself to God? If she did only the little which the rule prescribes and the community practices, by making meditation every day, by going to communion several times in the week, assisting at mass every morning, hearing frequently the word of God, performing the spiritual exercises for eight days every year, and so many other devotions which are practiced in the convent, she will do enough to make her a saint. Listen to me, my child: whenever the devil shall tempt you to abandon your vocation to the religious state, call to mind what I now tell you: that in the world the number of females who are saved is small; but in convents the number of those who are damned is small, and very small.

In fine, had you remained in the world, you could expect no better spouse than a grandee, a nobleman, or a monarch. But now you take for your spouse the King of heaven and of all the kingdoms of the earth! How many holy virgins have renounced the nuptials of the first monarchs of the earth, in order to be the spouses of Jesus Christ? Blessed Agnes refused the hand of the Emperor Ferdinand the Second, and shut herself up in a monastery. Other holy virgins have chosen to lose their lives rather than cease to be the spouses of Jesus Christ. St. Agnes was sought after by many Roman nobles; but she was content to be beheaded sooner than forsake Jesus Christ. St. Domittilla refused to be the spouse of the Count Aurelian; in punishment of her refusal, she was burnt alive and died a martyr. To St. Susanna was offered the hand of the emperor Maximin; but, in order to preserve her fidelity to Jesus Christ, she preferred to lose her life by the hand of the executioner, and received the crown of martyrdom.

Leave, then, my child, leave to those young ladies who love the world, all their amusements, vanities, splendid dresses, comedies, banquets, and festivities, and rejoice in Jesus Christ. In your cell he will give you more happiness than you could receive from all the pleasures, pomps, and riches possessed by all the queens of the earth. In your solitary cell you shall enjoy a paradise and a continual peace. If you love Jesus Christ, you will love the solitude which you shall find in your cell. There our crucified spouse will speak familiarly to your heart: from that cross he shall send forth rays of light to your understanding, and burning darts of holy love to your heart. And in the solitude of your cell you will disclose to him the love which you bear him, and will continually make oblations of yourself and of all you possess to him; you will ask him for the graces which you stand in need of; you will communicate to him all the difficulties and fears which trouble you, and he will console you. Doubt not but the divine spouse will always console you during life, and much more at death, when, instead of being obliged to die in a secular house, surrounded by children, relatives, servants, and friends, none of whom would say to you a single word for the good of your soul, you shall have the happiness of dying in the house of God, surrounded by your holy sisters in religion, who will comfort you by holy discourses, and will encourage you to appear with great confidence before your spouse, who will come to meet you with a crown in his hand, to make you a queen in his blessed kingdom, in return for the love which you have borne him.

I have said that religious who give themselves to God enjoy a continual peace; I mean that peace which can be had on this earth, which is called a valley of tears. In heaven, God prepares for us that full and perfect peace, which is exempt from all trouble. But this earth is for us a place of merit, and consequently it is a place of suffering, where, by patiently carrying the cross, the joys of paradise are gained. The spouse, blessed sister, which you take this morning, though he is the most noble, the richest, and the greatest you can find, is called, and really is a bloody spouse. "A bloody spouse thou art to me." A bloody spouse, who has shed all his blood by dint of scourges, thorns, and nails, that thus he might save your soul and the souls of all men. Behold, your loving Jesus goes before you, and invites you to follow him as a spouse. Look at him, then, and see how he goes, not crowned with flowers, but with thorns; not clothed with gold and gems, but with blood and wounds: look at the royal throne on which he lies; it is a hard cross on which he agonizes, and on which, for the love of you, he dies in a sea of pains and ignominies.

Listen to the words in which he invites you to follow him: "If any man will follow me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me"—Mark viii. 34. The first thing he demands of you is to deny yourself: let him deny himself. In a word, he wishes you, in the first place, to take away your affections from all creatures. Your spouse will never be satisfied with you, unless he sees you entirely his own. And to belong entirely to him, you must divest yourself of all earthly affections to vanity, property, relatives, to self-esteem, or self-will. Above all, it is necessary to watch over your heart, and not to allow an attachment to any person to enter it. When any creature wishes to rob Jesus Christ of a part of the love which you owe him, and which he desires entirely for himself, say, with St. Agnes: "Depart from me, food of death, I am prevented by another lover." Begone, food of death, Jesus, my God and my spouse, has been the first to love me, he has won my whole heart: depart, begone, for in my heart there is no place for you. And, my child, to preserve the remembrance of this sentiment, keep in mind what will be said to you when you shall receive the veil, which represents the care with which you should hide yourself from the eyes of the world, that you may never admit any other love, or any other lover than Jesus Christ. After receiving the veil, you shall say: "He has placed his seal on my forehead, that I may admit no lover but him."

Hence, you, this morning, change your habit and your name: you change your habit: you lay aside the dress of the world, and put on that of religion, that you may entirely forget the world and all worldly vanities. You also change your name, that the world may forget you, and that, as if dead to the world, you may be so separated from it that all shall regard you as no longer in the world.

The second thing which Jesus Christ demands of you is, to carry with resignation the crosses which shall be laid upon you: "let him take up his cross." Your cross shall be the observance of the rules of the monastery, and the fulfilment of the directions of your superior. It is impossible for a nun to be a good religious, unless she practice perfect obedience to the rules of the community, and to the commands of her superiors. Your cross also shall be to suffer with meekness all the contradictions, mortifications, and humiliations which shall happen to you: the religious who refuses to submit to humiliations shows that she is not humble, and the nun who is not humble will not become a saint, and is in great danger of being lost. In a word, there is no other way to heaven than that of the cross, and of patience in carrying it; and for the souls whom he wishes to be saints, God finds in all places crosses to afflict them, and make them his true spouses.

ful to Jesus Christ. Love and fidelity are the principal virtues of a spouse. Hence, you shall receive the ring as a mark of the fidelity with which you ought to preserve the love you have promised to Jesus Christ. But if you wish to be faithful do not trust in your promise: you must continually pray to Jesus Christ for holy perseverance, and must implore his holy mother to obtain it for you. Be careful to place great confidence in the intercession of Mary, who is called the mother of perseverance. And when you feel cold in divine love, and inclined to love any creature, ask yourself the following questions: Why have I left the world, my family, and relatives? Is it to bring myself to damnation? This thought encouraged St. Bernard, when he felt his fervour cooling, to resume the way of perfection. "Bernarde ad quid venisti." Bernard, he would say, why have you left the world, and entered into a monastery? Is it not to become a saint? Why, then, do you not labour to become a saint?

By this means St. Bernard lived and died a saint. My sister, I hope that you will imitate him, and that I shall see you a saint and a queen in heaven, among so many virgins who reign in that kingdom of bliss. I must terminate my discourse, your spouse commands me: he eagerly desires to see you soon in his own house. Behold with what gladness he expects you, and listen to his loving invitation to enter this monastery—his royal palace. Go, then, and enter with joy: for the welcome with which your spouse shall receive you this morning into his own house, is a pledge of the welcome with which he will receive you after death into the kingdom of paradise.

Live, Jesus, our hope, and Mary, our hope.

ADVICE TO A YOUNG LADY IN DOUBT ABOUT THE STATE OF LIFE WHICH SHE OUGHT TO EMBRACE.

Blessed sister, you are deliberating about the choice of a state of life. I see that you are agitated because the world wishes you to belong to itself, and to enter the married state; and, on the other hand, Jesus Christ wishes you to give yourself to him by becoming a nun in some convent of exact observance. Remember that on the choice which you shall make your eternal salvation depends. Hence, I recommend you, as soon as you read this advice, to implore the Lord every day to give you light and strength to embrace that state which will be most conducive to your salvation; that thus you may not afterwards, when your error shall be irreparable, have to repent of the choice you have made for your whole life and for all eternity.

Examine whether you will be more happy in having for your spouse a man of the world, or Jesus Christ, the Son of God and the king of heaven; see which of them appears to be the better spouse, and then make your choice. At the age of thirteen the holy virgin St. Agnes, was, on account of her extraordinary beauty, sought after by many. Among the rest, the son of the Roman Prefect asked her for his spouse; but looking at Jesus Christ, who wished her to belong to him, she said: I have found a spouse better than you, and than all the monarchs of this world; therefore I cannot exchange him for any other. And rather than exchange him she was content to lose her life, and cheerfully suffered martyrdom for Jesus Christ. The holy virgin Domitilla gave a similar answer to the Count Aurelian; she, too, died a martyr, and was burned alive, because she would not forsake Jesus Christ. Oh! how happy do these holy virgins now feel in heaven; how happy will they feel for all eternity at having made so good a choice The same happy lot awaits you, and will await all young females who renounce the world in order to give themselves to Jesus Christ.

In the next place, examine the consequences of the state of the person who chooses the world, and of the person who makes choice of Jesus Christ. The world offers earthly goods, riches, honours, amusements, and pleasures. On the other hand, Jesus Christ presents to you scourges, thorns, opprobrium, and crosses; for these were the goods which he chose for himself all the days of his mortal life. But, then, he offers you two immense goods which the world cannot give—peace of soul in this life, and paradise in the next.

Moreover, before you decide on embracing any state, you must reflect that your soul is immortal; that is, that after the present life, which shall soon end, you must pass into eternity, in which you shall receive that place of punishment or of reward, which you shall have merited by your works during life. Thus you must remain for all eternity in the house either of eternal life or of eternal death, in which, after your departure from this world, it will be your lot first to dwell: you shall be either for ever saved and happy amid the joys of paradise, or for ever lost and in despair in the torments of hell. In the meantime, consider that everything in this world must soon end. Happy all that are saved; miserable the soul that is damned. Keep always in mind that great maxim of Jesus Christ: "What will it profit a man to gain the whole world, if he lose his own soul?" This maxim has sent so many from the world to shut themselves up in the cloister, or to live in the deserts; it has inspired so many young females with courage to forsake the world in order to give themselves to God, and to die a holy death.

On the other hand, consider the unhappy lot of so many ladies of fortune, so many princesses and queens, who in the world have been attended, praised, honoured, and almost adored; but if they are damned, what do they now find in hell of so much riches, of so many pleasures, of so many honours enjoyed in this life, but pains and remorses of conscience, which shall torment them for ever, as long as God shall be God, without any hope of remedy for their eternal ruin.

But let us now give a glance at the goods which the world gives in this life to its followers, and to the goods which God gives to her who loves him and forsakes the world for his sake. The world makes great promises, but do we not all see that the world is a traitor which promises what it never performs? But though it should fulfil all its promises, what does it give? It gives earthly goods, but does it give the peace and the life of happiness which it promises? All its goods delight the senses and the flesh, but do not content the heart and the soul. Our souls have been created by God for the sole purpose of loving him in this life, and of enjoying him in the next. Hence, all the goods of the earth, all its delights, and all its grandeurs, are outside the heart: they enter not into the soul which God alone can content. Solomon has even called all worldly goods vanities and lies, which do not content but afflict the soul. "Vanitas vanitatum et afflictio spiritus." Vanity of vanities and affliction of spirit. This we know also from experience, for we see that the more a person abounds in these goods the greater her anguish and misery of mind. If by its goods the world gave content to the soul, great indeed would be the happiness of princesses and queens, who want neither amusements, nor comedies, nor festivities, nor banquets, nor splendid palaces, nor beautiful carriages, nor costly dresses, nor precious jewels, nor servants, nor ladies of honour to attend and pay homage to them. But no: they who imagine them to be happy are deceived. Ask them if they enjoy perfect peace, if they are perfectly content, and they will answer: What peace? what content? They will tell you that they lead a life of misery, and that they know not what peace is. The maltreatment which they receive from their husbands, the displeasure caused by their children, the wants of the house, the jealousies and fears to which they are subject, make them live in the midst of continual anguish and bitterness. Married women may be called martyrs of patience, if they bear all with resignation; but unless they are patient and resigned they will suffer a martyrdom in this world, and a more painful martyrdom in the next.

The remorses of conscience, though they had nothing else to suffer, keep married persons in continual torment. Being attached to earthly goods, they reflect but little on spiritual things: they seldom approach the sacraments, and seldom recommend themselves to God; and being deprived of these helps to a good life, they will scarcely be able to live without sin and without continual remorses of conscience. Behold, then, how all the joys promised by the world become to married persons sources of bitterness, of fears, and of damnation. How many of them shall say: Unhappy me, what will become of me after so many sins, after the life which I led, at a distance from God, always going from bad to worse? I would wish for retirement in order to spend a little time in mental prayer, but the affairs of the family and of the house, which is always in confusion, do not permit it. I would wish to hear sermons, to go to confession, to communicate often; I would wish to go often to the church, but my husband does not wish it. My unceasing occupations, the care of children, the frequent visits of friends, keep me confined to the house; and thus it is not without some difficulty that I can hear mass at a late hour on festivals. How great was my folly in entering the married state, when I could become a saint in a convent! But all these lamentations only serve to increase their pain, because they see that it is no longer in their power to change the unhappy choice they have made of living in the world. And if their life is unhappy, their death shall be much more miserable. At that awful hour they shall be surrounded by servants, by their husbands, and children bathed in tears; but instead of giving them relief, all these will be to them an occasion of greater affliction. And thus afflicted, poor in merits, and full of fears for their eternal salvation, they must go to present themselves to Jesus Christ to be judged by him. But on the other hand, how great will be the happiness which a nun, who has left the world for Jesus Christ, shall enjoy, living amongst so many spouses of God, and in a solitary cell, at a distance from the turmoils of the world and from the proximate danger of losing God, to which seculars are exposed. How much greater shall be her consolation at death, after having spent her years in meditation, mortifications, and spiritual exercises; in visits to the holy sacrament, in confessions, communions, acts of humility, of hope, and love of Jesus Christ. And though the devil should endeavour to terrify her by the faults committed in younger days, her spouse, for whom she has left the world, will console her, and thus, full of confidence, she will die in the embraces of her crucified Redeemer, who will conduct her to heaven, there to enjoy eternal happiness.

Thus, blessed sister, since you must make choice of a state of life, make the choice now which you will wish at death to have made. At death, every one who sees that for her the world is about to end, says: Oh! that I had led the life of a saint. Oh! that I had left the world and given myself to God. But what is then done is done, and nothing remains for her but to breathe forth her soul, and to go to hear from Jesus Christ: Come, blessed soul, and rejoice with me for eternity; or, Begone for ever to hell at a distance from me. You, then, must choose the world or Jesus Christ. If you choose the world, you will probably repent of the choice; hence, you ought to reflect well upon it. In the world the number of females who are lost is very great; in religion, the number of those damned is very small. Recommend yourself to Jesus crucified, and to most holy Mary, that they may make you choose the state most conducive to your eternal salvation. If you wish to become a nun, resolve to become a saint; if you intend to lead a loose and imperfect life, like some religious, it is useless for you to enter a convent; you would then only lead an unhappy life and die an unhappy death. But if you are resolved not to become a religious, I cannot advise you to enter the married state, for St. Paul does not counsel that state to any one, except in case of necessity, which I hope does not exist for you. At least remain in your own house, and endeavour to become a saint. I entreat you to say the following prayer for nine days.

My Lord Jesus Christ, who hast died for my salvation, I implore thee through the merits of thy passion, to give me light and strength to choose that state which is best for my salvation. And do thou, O my Mother, Mary, obtain this grace for me by thy powerful intercession. Amen.

THE END.
